Mr. DYER. I would like to ask my colleague from Missouri if his amendment is to provide that the money originally intended for this institution at Springfield shall be carried in this bill?

Mr. JOHNSON of Missouri. May I make this explanation at this time? The original authorization provided that not to exceed $2,500,000 should be expended for a hospital for defectives at Springfield, Mo. Based upon that authorization the Director of the Bureau of Prisons solicited donations of sites. He gave the data to the people at Springfield and to other communities, and based upon those facts and upon that data the citizens of Springfield donated $135,000, on the expectation that the original authorization of $2,500,000 would be expended. My amendment merely seeks to amend the appropriation so that the amount will be carried as originally intended.

Mr. DYER. And that will carry out the agreement which the Government made with the people of Springfield, Mo.?

Mr. JOHNSON of Missouri. That is exactly it.

Mr. DYER. With all due regard to the committee, for which I have the highest respect, it seems to me the committee should not insist upon cutting down the amount under those circumstances, because it has got to be provided for at some time, and that being true, why not at this time and at the same time keeping faith with the people of Springfield, Mo.?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. The attitude of the committee is this: It has no desire to present this matter to the committee now, unless the committee wishes it done. I understand the gentleman from Missouri is not in favor of the recommendation made by the committee, and it was because I thought he might prefer to have longer time to read the hearings that I suggested the matter be postponed until Monday.

Mr. DYER. My colleague represents the district in which Springfield is located. I only want to render him, if I can, any possible assistance in seeing that the Government keeps faith with the people of Springfield, Mo.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. On Monday I will further present the views of the committee.

Mr. LOZIER. When does the gentleman now expect to take up this item?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Monday afternoon.

The Clerk read as follows:

Construction: For the remodeling and construction of the necessary buildings and appurtenances, purchase of mechanical equipment, and other expenses incident to the construction of buildings in accordance with the provisions of "An act for the establishment of a United States Industrial Reformatory," approved January 7, 1925 (U. S. C., title 18, sec. 832), to be expended under the direction and upon the written order of the Attorney General, or his authorized representative, by contract or purchase of material and hire of labor and services and utilization of labor of United States prisoners, as the Attorney General may direct, $700,000, to be immediately available and to remain available until expended: Provided, That the total sum to be expended for such purposes shall not exceed $3,000,000: Provided further, That the Secretary of the Treasury, if in his discretion it would be impracticable to cause the plans, drawings, designs, specifications, and estimates for the remodeling and construction of the necessary buildings to be prepared in the Office of the Supervising Architect of the Treasury Department, and the work of remodeling and constructing the said buildings to be supervised by the field force of said office, may contract for all or any portion of such work to be performed by such suitable person or firm as he may select.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that appropriations relating to the Springfield hospital, Missouri, and the Chillicothe, Ohio, hospital go over until Monday afternoon. The paragraph relative to Chillicothe will be found on page 49, line 19, down to and including line 21, on page 50. The item in reference to the hospital for defective delinquents will be found on page 51, line 23, down to line 17, on page 52. I do this in order that gentlemen may have the opportunity of reading the hearings and presenting their objections to the recommendation of the committee in connection with these two items.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman from Alabama a question. As I understand, the part of the bill relating to the prohibition appropriation is also to go over until Monday?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. That goes over until Tuesday.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. So the items relating to the hospitals at Springfield, Mo., and at Chillicothe, Ohio, will be taken up Monday afternoon?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, may I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Yes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I understand we will have an opportunity then to fully discuss the sections relating to the United States Industrial Hospital at Chillicothe, Ohio?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Yes; and to offer amendments thereto. I am doing this only in the interest of gentlemen who I understand are not in agreement with the recommendations of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Federal jails: For the purchase of sites, constructing, remodeling, and equipping necessary buildings, purchase and installation of machinery and equipment, and all necessary expenses incident thereto, for establishing new Federal jails and altering and adapting other Government property for jail purposes, as authorized by the act entitled "An act to reorganize the administration of Federal prisons; to authorize the Attorney General to contract for the care of United States prisoners; to establish Federal jails, and for other purposes," approved May 14, 1930 (U. S. C., Supp. V, title 18, secs. 753c, 753d), to be expended under the direction and upon the written order of the Attorney General, by contract or purchase of material and hire of labor and services and utilization of labor of United States prisoners, as the Attorney General may direct, $10,000, to remain available until expended; and the Attorney General may contract with such suitable person or firm as he may select for the work of preparing plans, drawings, designs, specifications, and estimates for remodeling and construction of the necessary buildings.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. OLIVER of Alabama: On page 53, line 16, strike out "$10,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$500."

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I am offering this amendment, not for the purpose of preventing the building of the jail in Kentucky but for the purpose of reducing the appropriation.

The Congress appropriated at one time $1,000,000 and then $500,000 for the purpose of building jails. There is an unexpended balance of that $1,500,000, and we had appropriated $10,000, thinking that the unexpended balance was not so great as we now find it to be. We wanted to give sufficient money to build, if they desired to do so, a jail in Kentucky, where they insisted one was needed.

I find now that there is an unexpended balance sufficient to build the jail, if the Attorney General should decide to do so, without making this appropriation of $10,000, and for that reason I am reducing it to $500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Probation system, United States courts: For salaries and expenses of probation officers, as authorized by the act entitled "An act to amend the act of March 4, 1925, chapter 521, and for other purposes," approved June 6, 1930 (U. S. C., Supp. V, title 18, sec. 726), $440,000: Provided, That not to exceed $80,000 of this appropriation may be expended for travel and subsistence: Provided further, That no part of this or any other appropriation shall be used to defray the salary or expenses of any probation officer who does not comply with the official orders, regulations, and probation standards promulgated by the Attorney General.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word just to ask the gentleman from Alabama a question.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Again, may I say to the distinguished gentleman from Missouri, who, I know, is deeply interested in this matter because his committee reported the bill, that I made a very long statement about this just before the bill was taken up under the 5-minute rule.

Mr. DYER. May I just ask the gentleman this question: There is no lessening of the money to carry on this work?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. No; we are increasing it by $210,000.

Mr. DYER. I will say to the gentleman that this is very necessary, because the courts are beginning to take advantage of the law to the very great benefit of the prisoners. They are now able to put a lot of men on probation who are first offenders, and the system is working out remarkably well.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. It was at the request of the judges and the Attorney General that this increase was made.

Mr. DYER. I think the Congress should give all possible encouragement to the courts to take advantage of this statute.

The Clerk read as follows:

Enforcement of China trade act: To carry out the provisions of the act entitled "China trade act, 1922" (U. S. C., title 15, secs. 141–162), including personal services in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, traveling and subsistence expenses of officers and employees, purchase of furniture and equipment, stationery and supplies, typewriting, adding and computing machines, accessories and repairs, purchase of books of reference and periodicals, reports, documents, plans, specifications, maps, manuscripts, and all other publications; rent outside the District of Columbia; ice and drinking water for office purposes, and all necessary expenses not included in the foregoing, $22,000: Provided, That payment in advance for telephone and other similar services under this appropriation is hereby authorized.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, to make a short statement. Mr. Chairman, there has been from time to time some discussion on the floor with reference to our situation in the Far East. It has been intimated that the fact that this statute, known as the China trade act, of which I was the author, was passed, has in effect made it of some concern to our country, as far as the Far East is concerned.

I want to make the statement that this act has nothing of consequence to do with the concern of our country in the Far East at this time. Under this act there has been a good many companies organized in China, mostly with a small capital, to do business, competing with companies under British law and other nationals.

This act was simply for the purpose of giving to our nationals an opportunity to compete with the nationals of other countries on equal terms.

Before the statute was enacted Americans endeavoring to do business in China had to do it under a charter that came from some State because China has not been in a position to grant charters to do business in China.

The United States has no vast interests in China. It is considerable, but we have a great many nationals, in whom we are most concerned at this time, in the Far East. Our concern is for our nationals, wherever they are, and it is the duty of the Government to give to them every protection possible.

According to the latest data available, American investments in China aggregate at least $150,000,000, as compared with about $200,000,000 for French investments, $1,250,000,000 for Japanese investments, and $1,300,000,000 for British investments.

Some estimates of American investments in China run as high as $265,000,000, but these estimates include an item of $75,000,000 for missionary and other noncommercial investments and $30,000,000 or more for commercial loans unsecured or inadequately secured.

As to foreign investments in Japan, our estimate of the portion held by Americans is about $385,000,000 as of the end of 1930—all but $143,000,000 of which is represented by holdings of Japanese Government or Government-guaranteed bonds. No data on British and French investments in Japan are readily available at the moment, but it is probably safe to say that those of the British are somewhat less than ours, while those of the French are relatively small.

In other words, a number of countries have vastly larger interests in China and Japan than we have. We have certain treaty rights under which we do business in China, and have been doing it for some time, with much advantage to our own country.

These corporations, created under the China trade act, and concerning which I arose to speak of, have been of great help in aiding the citizens of this country to take part in the foreign trade of China and putting us on an equal standing and basis with Great Britain, Japan, and some other countries. It has been very helpful.

None of the really big corporations, like the Standard Oil or the American Tobacco Co., have taken advantage of the statute; they are not chartered under it.

I call attention to this so that it may be seen that the statute has been of great benefit to the foreign trade in China and very helpful to this country. I am glad to note that the committee has continued the appropriation for the next fiscal year.

For more detailed information concerning the China trade act companies I include some data from the Department of Commerce. It is as follows:

Hon. L. C. DYER,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: In response to your recent request to Mr. A. S. Hillyer, assistant registrar of China trade act companies, I am pleased to submit the attached report to show companies now operating with Federal charters under the China trade act, the date the charters were issued to each, and the authorized capital of each company.

No attempt has been made to report the actual paid-in capital of each company, which, however, it is possible to determine by reference to the balance sheet of the various companies for the year 1930, if such is desired, but at least 25 per cent of the authorized capital has been paid in to conform to the requirements of the act.

Companies now operating under the act total 100, 14 of which were chartered during the past year.

Since the operation of the act 34 companies have ceased to operate and have been granted certificates of dissolution.

It is interesting to note that, doubtless due to the low price prevailing in China of silver, the capital of some of the companies has been increased, the record showing that during 1931 certificates of amendments to articles of incorporation were issued by the department to seven companies, providing for a capital increase of $4,476,210 United States currency.

Yours very truly,

FREDERICK M. FEIKER, Director.

The approximate authorized capital, expressed in gold dollars, figured at current conversion rates is $29,436,157.

NOTE.—No attempt has been made to report the actual paid-in capital of each company, but under the act at least 25 per cent of the authorized capital must be paid in before the charter is delivered.

During the year 1931, certificates of amendments to articles of incorporation were issued to seven companies permitting an increase of approximately $4,476,210 capitalization.

During the year 1931, 14 new companies were chartered under the act, and during the same period certificates of dissolution were issued to 10 companies.

Certificates of incorporation have been issued in this year (1932) to two companies, and certificates of dissolution have also been issued to two companies.

The Clerk read as follows:

Load lines on American vessels: To enable the Secretary of Commerce to carry out the provisions of the act entitled "An act to establish load lines for American vessels, and for other purposes," approved March 2, 1929 (U. S. C., Supp. V, title 46, secs. 85–85g), including personal services in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, traveling expenses, rentals, purchase of instruments and other equipment, furniture, stationery and office supplies, repairs to equipment, books of reference and other necessary publications, documents, plans and specifications, contract stenographic reporting services without reference to section 3709 of the Revised Statutes (U. S. C., title 41, sec. 5), and all other incidental expenses not included in the foregoing, $23,440, of which not to exceed $14,840 may be expended for personal services in the District of Columbia.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. OLIVER: Page 74, line 4, after the word "exceed," strike out "$14,840" and insert "$17,500."

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, this does not increase the appropriation, and is offered at the urgent insistence of the department. They feel that it is important.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. OLIVER of Alabama: Page 92, line 6, after the word "meetings," strike out "of the International Research Council or of its branches and."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Pay, commissioned officers: For pay and allowances prescribed by law for commissioned officers on sea duty and other duty, holding relative rank with officers of the Navy, including 1 director, with relative rank of captain, 6 hydrographic and geodetic engineers with relative rank of captain, 10 hydrographic and geodetic engineers with relative rank of commander, 17 hydrographic and geodetic engineers with relative rank of lieutenant commander, 47 hydrographic and geodetic engineers with relative rank of lieutenant, 61 junior hydrographic and geodetic engineers with relative rank of lieutenant (junior grade), 29 aides with relative rank of ensign, and including officers retired in accordance with existing law, $662,313: Provided, That the Secretary of Commerce may designate one of the hydrographic and geodetic engineers to act as assistant director.

Mr. ALLGOOD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of inquiring the reason for the proviso on page 93 of the bill that the Secretary of Commerce may designate one of the hydrographic and geodetic engineers to act as assistant director. Is that a new position?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. That is a proviso that has been carried for some time.

Mr. ALLGOOD. Does that carry a salary?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Yes; it carries a salary. He is appointed from the force. If there is a vacancy when this bill passes, and an amendment to be offered is adopted, then no one can be appointed to a vacancy without the written consent of the President.

The Clerk read as follows:

Commutation of rations (not to exceed $1 per day) may be paid to officers and crews of vessels of the Bureau of Fisheries during the fiscal year 1933 under regulations prescribed by the Secretary of Commerce.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

I would like to ask the chairman of the committee what the ration is. The bill provides not to exceed $1. Does the gentleman have the exact amount of the ration?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. It varies and depends largely on the size of the boat and the number of employees.

Mr. GOSS. But is the ration of each man so much per day?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Yes.

Mr. GOSS. Does the gentleman know what that amount is?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. It varies, depending on the number in the crew.

Mr. GOSS. Well, can the gentleman give an average?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. The average is about a dollar a day, I should say.

Mr. GOSS. The average is a dollar a day?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Yes; that is about the average.

Mr. GOSS. So that at least it is not any lower than that in the Army and the Navy?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. No, sir; that is about 60 cents, so this is higher.

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

For printing the weekly issue of patents, designs, trade-marks, prints, and labels, exclusive of illustrations; and for printing, engraving illustrations, and binding the Official Gazette, including weekly and annual indices, $1,110,000; for miscellaneous printing and binding, $54,000; in all, $1,164,000.

Mr. ALLGOOD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to return to line 11, page 97, for the purpose of asking a question in regard to the item mentioned there.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

There was no objection.

Mr. ALLGOOD. Why is it necessary to furnish food, fuel, and clothing and the other necessities of life to the natives of the Pribilof Islands of Alaska when we have several millions of our own people here in the United States who are cold and hungry and without a job?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Well, it has been carried for a number of years at that same figure. These people are real wards of the Government, in a sense. We have established some schools there. That service has been carried on since I have been a member of the committee.

Mr. ALLGOOD. How does it come they are wards of the Government?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Well, I have just stated that in one sense they are. We have been caring for them. That has been true since I have been a member of the committee.

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that, beginning on line 14, page 101, down to the end of line 25 on page 113, all inclusive, go over until Monday evening.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Salaries and expenses: For the expenses of carrying on the work of the Bureau of Naturalization, as provided in the acts authorizing a uniform rule for the naturalization of aliens throughout the United States, and establishing the Bureau of Naturalization, approved June 29, 1906, and March 4, 1913, and subsequent acts (U. S. C., title 8, secs. 331–416; U. S. C., Supp. V, title 8, secs. 355–384); including personal services; traveling expenses, and not to exceed $400 for expenses of attendance at meetings concerned with the naturalization of aliens when incurred on the written authority of the Secretary of Labor; street-car fare, telegrams, verifications of legal papers, telephone service in field offices and telephone toll service in the bureau; necessary supplies and equipment for the Naturalization Service; refunding of naturalization fees upon presentation of evidence showing conclusively that the collection and deposit was made through error; not to exceed $25,000 for rent of offices outside of the District of Columbia where suitable quarters can not be obtained in public buildings; and for mileage and fees to witnesses subpœnaed on behalf of the United States, the expenditures from this appropriation to be made in the manner and under such regulations as the Secretary of Labor may prescribe, $1,075,770, of which not to exceed $239,260 may be expended for the salary of the commissioner and other personal services in the bureau in the District of Columbia: Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be available for the compensation of assistants to clerks of United States courts.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I want to ask the chairman of the subcommittee what is meant by that proviso. Are there any of those assistants to clerks now drawing compensation?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. There are none now getting it, but in the absence of that proviso they would.

Mr. GOSS. I understand that has been the regular practice for some years.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. That provision has been carried in previous bills.

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

Mr. ALLGOOD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. I would like to ask a question in regard to the appropriation of $1,075,770. How does that compare with the appropriation for the last year?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. That is a little less than the Bureau of the Budget recommended for this year.

Mr. ALLGOOD. How does this amount compare with last year and the year before?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. It is about what was carried last year when you take into account the deficiency appropriation which was made for this service.

Mr. ALLGOOD. The reason I am asking this question is because, as I understand, our immigration has almost ceased, due to the fact that we have put up our immigration bars.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. This fund is also for the purpose of getting many out of the country who are here unlawfully. That is what it is now largely expended for. It is a lump-sum appropriation and used largely for the purpose of deporting aliens. If the gentleman will read the report, he will find that they have deported a very large number during the present year. The number runs well over 25,000.

Mr. ALLGOOD. I note there is an appropriation of $50,000 for the renovation of buildings and the purchase of equipment at Ellis Island. I favor the expenditure of money used to send aliens out of this country, but with practically no foreigners being permitted to come to the United States through Ellis Island I thought that we could reduce these expenditures.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. They deport probably more from Ellis Island now than come in through that port. That is a deporting station as well as a receiving station.

Mr. ALLGOOD. So it is necessary to keep up the buildings for the purpose of deporting aliens?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Yes. They are just completing a station at Galveston, from where they are deporting large numbers.

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

The Clerk read down to and including line 3 on page 121.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. McREYNOLDS, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 9349) making appropriations for the Departments of State and Justice and for the judiciary, and for the Departments of Commerce and Labor, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION 14

Mr. ALLGOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the "lame-duck" amendment and to include therein a short article.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ALLGOOD. Mr. Speaker, the constitutional amendment abolishing the "lame-duck" Congresses will soon be in conference, and I hope the conferees of the House and Senate will be able to iron out the differences and that this amendment, which I indorse whole-heartedly, will soon be submitted to the States for ratification. When this amendment was before this body Hon. W. B. BANKHEAD, of Alabama, proposed an amendment making the term of Representatives four years instead of two. One Member of this House, in speaking against the proposed amendment of Mr. BANKHEAD, said, "I would give up my term as a Member of the House before I would vote to extend that term." At this point I am inserting an editorial from the Southern Democrat, an Alabama paper, touching on this particular amendment:

The Constitution of the United States should be amended so that Congressmen will take their seats in January after they are elected in November and will serve for a term of four years instead of only two. Congress should convene in January instead of the following December. Under our present system a Congressman has to be looking after his political fences all the time and has no time to study great economic and social problems. He is all the time studying about what he can do to popularize himself with the people of his district. Men who have to fight for reelection every two years seldom make statesmen. Give them a rest from politics and they will become more efficient as lawmakers.

No Member of this House can by his vote on this or any other measure extend his own term. If the Bankhead amendment had prevailed our terms of office would all have expired long before it became the law of the land, and the people back home are the ones who would say whether or not our terms would be extended. Therefore it is by their votes that any Member's term is extended even for two years, if a Member of this House could extend his own term, I am afraid that there would be very few elections held in the future.

EDUCATING FOR WORLD CONCEPT

Mr. OSIAS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD on education.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. OSIAS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD I insert the following address made by me at the commencement exercises of the Western Illinois State Teachers College, Macomb, Ill.:

Mr. President, members of the faculty, members of the graduating class, ladies, and gentlemen, the invitation from the Western Illinois State Teachers College, my own beloved alma mater, to be your commencement speaker was a challenge which I could ill afford to evade coming from an institution in a city where I spent three out of five delightful and profitable years as a student in the United States. I am grateful for this signal honor.

My participation in these solemn exercises is provocative of thoughts on the countries which you and I represent and the conditions that therein obtain. The land whence I hail and your land present obvious contrasts. The United States, once but a strip of land along the Atlantic seaboard, in a century and a half has grown into a veritable empire extending from the Atlantic to the Pacific and from the Gulf to the Lakes. The Philippines is an island country of 115,000 square miles. The American people, over 120,000,000, possess wealth not enjoyed by any other people in the world, while the Filipino people, numbering 13,000,000, are relatively poor, although not without great resources. Yours is an independent republic, strong and wonderfully self-contained, while mine is still dependent.

The contrast could be continued, but it is not our differences that I wish to emphasize. More significant are our points of contact, our similarities, conditions that suggest analogies. An ordinary mind sees obvious differences of the east and west, but calm reflection reveals the essential parallelisms of culture, hopes, and aspirations. The American and Filipino peoples are alike in their passion for education, in their devotion to religion, in their attachment to progress, in their faith in democracy, in their love of freedom, of peace, and of all those other virtues, ideals, and principles universally recognized as invaluable and priceless.

PROGRESS TOWARD WORLD FEDERATION

The last century witnessed gigantic strides toward the goal which has been the dream of those who were once ridiculed as visionaries but whom time has since vindicated and who are now looked upon as statesmen and sages. We are living witnesses of the great shrinking of the world, brought about by modern inventions and discoveries, by the arts and sciences. Synchronous with this phenomenon has come a development in the concept of man adequate for a changing and an advancing world. There is now a general recognition of the fundamental unity of mankind.

Ours is an era of progress. It is an epoch headed toward greater cooperation, harmony, and peace. It is an age when "the parliament of man" and "the federation of the world" are becoming a reality. If education is to continue as an agency of progress, it must be utilized as an instrumentality to promote the dominant thoughts and tendencies of the times. A new demand is placed upon higher institutions of learning, that of educating for world concept.

WORLD AIM OF EDUCATION

Among graduates of a teachers' college it is unnecessary to discuss in detail the various aims of education which have been expressed in terms of utility, of knowledge, of morality, of character, of citizenship, and of efficiency. All that need be done is to remind them that the definitions of education have kept pace with world changes and have invariably reflected imperious philosophic trends.

What is the aim of education at an age such as ours and in a world continually in a state of flux? I answer, education must be a process of securing for every individual, for every nation, and for humanity at large the highest and fullest measure of efficiency, freedom, and happiness.

We must educate for world concept in order to make universal the blessings of efficiency, freedom, and happiness.

THE WE CONCEPT

Education is, as it has always been, a process of developing and magnifying concept. It is a means of emancipating the individual and society from the narrow, selfish concept to the broad humanitarian concept.

To make my meaning clear let me bring to bear a Filipino point of view upon this thought.

There is one feature of the Filipino language which is unique and distinctive. It has twice as many numbers as there are in English. Ours has four numbers while yours has but two, the singular and the plural. Let me illustrate this in the language which I know best, the Ilocano.

In my native language we have these words:

1. Siac, which means "I"; this is the singular number.
2. Data, which means "we two"; this is the dual number.
3. Dacami, which means "we three or more," but is exclusive; this is what I call the intermediate plural or the plural exclusive number.
4. Datayo, which means "we" in the all-inclusive sense; this is the plural all-inclusive number.

Derived from these we have the possessive forms cuac, meaning "mine" exclusively; cuata, meaning "ours," but confined to two and only two; cuami, meaning "ours," signifying possession on the part of three or more, but automatically excluding others; and cuatayo, meaning "ours," which is truly plural all inclusive.

On the basis of these four numbers we have corresponding concepts. I shall illustrate. The word house in my language is balay. If I say balayCO, I mean that the house is mine exclusively; it expresses the singular concept. If I say balayTA, it means that the house belongs to me and one other; it signifies the dual concept. If I say balayMI, it means that the house belongs to me and two or more others, but exclusive of the rest; it expresses the plural exclusive concept. If I say balayTAYO, it means that the house belongs to all, exclusive of none; it expresses the plural all-inclusive concept.

Redefining education in terms of these ideas, I would say that it is a process of emancipating the individual and society from the purely singular concept, through the dual concept and the plural exclusive concept, to the plural all-inclusive concept. If education has for its mission the development of world concept, it must set itself consciously and persistently to the task of utilizing the content and method of education so as to function in broadening and magnifying concept from the extreme I-stage to the extreme We-stage. If educators, therefore, are to be accelerators of progress, they must send forth men and women from the higher institutions of learning imbued with the We concept. Such a mission entails preparing for citizenship of one's town, city, state, or country and citizenship of the world. A world concept is fundamental to world citizenship.

If we carefully analyze the growth of a cultivated individual we shall find that he undergoes these four stages corresponding to the four numbers which I have indicated. A child comes into the world selfish, egoistic, even egotistic. His first world is circumscribed by his self and selfish interests. While he is in the siac stage, the I stage, or the singular stage, his world revolves on the axis of his ego. At such a stage he wants a monopoly of things. He is not concerned with sharing. When a child living in such a world lays his hand on something edible, he wants it all for himself.

A little later he emerges from this narrow world. The idea of sharing dawns upon him. He is promoted to the data stage, or the We-two stage. His concept is no longer purely singular; it is dual. Give him something while at this stage, say, an ear of corn. He is now willing to divide it. But if left to himself, he divides the ear of corn into two unequal parts, and when he offers one part to his brother or sister he is careful to keep the larger one to himself. His concept has been broadened; it has been dualized, but the feeling of selfishness yet dominates.

Still later he is further promoted. Through a process of magnifying concept he is ushered into the dacami stage, the intermediate We stage or the plural exclusive stage. His concept is broadened, pluralized, let us say, but it is not wholly altruistic.

It is much later, if at all, when he is truly educated that the individual is emancipated and enters upon a far greater world. He advances to the datayo stage, the real We stage or the plural all-inclusive stage. His concept is truly pluralized. Ideas and ideals of altruism dominate his life and conduct. Not till such a point is reached, not till an individual possesses a true world concept, may his education be said to be complete.

What has been said of an individual undergoing these stages is true with a community or nation. A social or national concept has its narrowness, bigotry, and selfishness. Nations there are that live in stages that fall far short of the We stage or the plural all-inclusive concept. Citizens in countries at such stages tend to develop patriotic attitudes which are narrow and chauvinistic. Such attitudes are apt to lead to indifference, aloofness, suspicion, enmity, or war, rather than tolerance, confidence, good will, friendship, cooperation, harmony, and peace.

ADEQUATE BASIS FOR WORLD DEMOCRACY

It is necessary to find an adequate basis for the new order in accordance with this world concept. The spirit of imperialism, economic greed, vainglory, superiority, self-sufficiency, exploitation, domination, or like attitude clearly can not be an adequate basis for a world democracy. As long as selfish or antisocial attitudes dominate individuals and nations there can be little or no development of genuine cooperation among the peoples of the world.

Many things that are being done in social institutions designed to educate are not contributing to cooperation, harmony, and peace on earth. The placing of swords, revolvers, and guns in the hands of little children as toys; the use of cannons and cannon balls as decorations in private yards and public places; the undue featuring of wars and war heroes in the press and history texts; the learning of geography, with a disproportionate emphasis upon one country, as if it were more important than all other countries on earth; the teaching of civics to exalt the men and institutions of one's country and belittling those of others; the ignoring of the economic, the cultural, and the spiritual riches of other peoples and races—these and a thousand things that we do and fail to do in schools, colleges, and universities are retarding progress toward that objective of broad concept and understanding and sympathy, the consummation of which enlightened mankind devoutly covets.

Every people has its points of strength and points of weakness. No nation, however high in the scale of civilization, has a monopoly of virtues. No race, however far behind in the march of progress, has a monopoly of vices. Every nation, every race, has a contribution to humanity's common fund of knowledge and experience. The spirit of no one people, no one nation, no one race can be made the basis for a world democracy. A world concept is essential and necessary. Nothing less than the common denominator of mankind, to which the various peoples, nations, and races must contribute their best, can ever serve as an enduring basis for amity among peoples and peace among nations. This must be the basis of world democracy.

But with all the shortcomings and imperfections of human beings and human institutions there is reason for optimism. The progressive movement of the world is steady. The perfectibility of the human race is unlimited.

In our day we see evidences that there is a broader consciousness of human interrelations. There is, indeed, a new international conscience. There is less race antagonism, less arrogance, less intolerance, less disposition to exploit and to disregard the laws and principles of international life. There is a more general desire for good will, for understanding, for cooperation, for friendship, and for peace. There is greater disposition to accord good motives to others, to appreciate the cultures of other peoples, to respect their individualities, customs, idiosyncrasies, practices, hopes, and ideals and to see the good in other nations.

I think I can with propriety speak of these things representing as I am a people who are beneficiaries of the contributions of peoples from both hemispheres. My country has an oriental setting. We are essentially of Malayan ancestry. With a background of our own culture and civilization, we are inheritors of the traditions, practices, and faiths of various nations of the Far East. We have also received the impact of European culture. And more recently, by the coming of America to our shores, our life has been enriched by Anglo-Saxon influences. We are anxiously awaiting the day when the people of this great Republic shall grant us the boon of national freedom, for that day will be the commencement of a new renaissance in our civilization.

America's emergence to a position of world power was comparatively recent. Her high place among the world powers really was achieved within our generation. In a little over three decades America rose to a commanding position among the nations. After the World War she became a leader in world affairs. In the events of the last decade she had a conspicuous part in making the world more truly one and united.

The organization of the League of Nations, the establishment of the World Court, the inauguration of disarmament conferences, the celebration of world conventions, the approval of numerous peace treaties, the repeated avowals to renounce war as an instrument of national policy and to adopt pacific means to settle international differences are indicative of a new world conscience. We are in very truth at the dawn of a new age of greater security. There is a new spirit of peace.

Yet many still delight in asserting and reiterating a philosophy conceived in a world war weary "that the best way to prepare for peace is to prepare for war." If we wish to perpetuate war as an instrument of national policy, none is better calculated to foster it. But if we are really sincere and earnest in our desire for peace, then we must school individuals and nations in the thought that the only way to have peace is to prepare for peace.

Peace is a necessary condition in a world that has become so thoroughly interdependent and among peoples whose interests have come to be so closely intertwined. Now or in the future there can be no war of serious proportions without affecting human existence; no considerable overproduction or underconsumption without affecting the economic balance of the world; no marked decline in the value of silver or gold without threatening a serious crisis that would encircle the globe; no great epidemics or other calamities without producing concern everywhere; no upheavals, political or otherwise, that do not interest the leaders and statesmen of all nations. The good of one country is the welfare of all. The ill of one is the concern of all. It behooves us to remove those conditions that disturb equilibrium and to create conditions favorable to peace.

OBSTACLES TO WORLD PEACE

In the midst of this universal quest for an enduring basis of a new social order, two great obstacles beset the path to world peace. I refer firstly to race prejudice and, secondly, to unwelcome interference.

Race prejudice has been an archenemy of world progress. Although some races have been more guilty than others, every race has been afflicted with this malady.

The first step is a frank recognition that race prejudice is an obstacle to world amity.

The next step is valiantly to meet it and apply the remedy.

There are four stages in the development of racial consciousness. These are:

1. Racial innocence;
2. Racial prejudice;
3. Racial intelligence; and
4. Racial sympathy.

Children are by nature color blind. Place children together and, regardless of nationality or race, they mingle, play, and enjoy together. Prejudice is not inborn. It is injected in the innocent minds of childhood by ill-advised adults. By innuendoes or by overt acts children are influenced by older folks suffering from race-superiority complex to emerge from their racial innocence to the stage of race prejudice.

It is only by a proper knowledge of the achievements of other races and an appreciation of the excellence of every people that individuals acquire an intelligent attitude toward peoples and races. But it is not enough that there be racial intelligence. There must be a heart development, hence the need of racial sympathy. The racial attitudes of educated men and women must be elevated to the plane of racial intelligence and racial sympathy, for these are basic to race understanding and world amity.

The other obstacle to world peace is international meddling. Nations, especially those with imperialistic designs, impose control over other peoples and races. This unwelcome interference is a violation of the right of every nation to self-sovereignty.

The remedy lies in educating peoples in the principle of equality. Let one of the self-evident truths enunciated in the American Declaration of Independence that all men are created equal be made world-wide in its application and its observance.

This Nation went further in its declaration of purpose when she entered the World War. It went beyond the principle that all men are created equal. It enlarged it by saying that all nations, great and small, are entitled alike to self-determination. This ideal must be made real and universal. No nation worthy of the name is so ignorant that it can not manage its affairs better in the long run than unwelcome outsiders. Nations, like individuals, should observe in their dealings the principle of "live and let live" if they can not practice the ideal of "live and help live."

CHALLENGE TO EDUCATION

The new world situation presents a mighty challenge to educators and teachers. A new responsibility must be borne by educational agencies. For this task teachers must have a truly pluralized concept and must educate the youth for world concept.

With this concept as a guide, with world peace as an aim, with efficiency, freedom, and happiness as the trinity of objectives, education must busy itself with habituating children in friendship projects; training boys and girls in the arts of peace; accustoming young men and young women in those attitudes, thoughts, and habits of right perspective, broad sympathy, sane intelligence, and righteous tolerance, imbuing all with a proper understanding, appreciation, and knowledge of the worth and merit of individuals, peoples, and races, their culture and their achievement.

I am not unmindful that the task is difficult and complex. I am aware that education for these high and noble ends involves patient, scientific, and painstaking working out of the necessary technique. I am conscious that it means a thoroughgoing revision of texts, eliminating every misinformation, falsehood, or exaggeration, presenting facts and truths. I am sensible that it means a reform of subject matter and method, doing away with whatever makes for hatred and distrust, removing causes of misunderstanding and war, and creating facilities for peace and cooperation. I know that it is not easy to readjust conditions to suit worthy ends or to control processes and procedures to attain objectives.

And yet this is the great commission to teachers and educators, educational institutions and educative agencies. Nothing worth while and permanent can be accomplished unless it is backed by an enlightened public opinion. Education, if it is to continue as a vital force, must assume this mission until the great ideal shall be sufficiently dynamic that governments will provide ministries and secretaryships of peace even as we now have ministers and secretaries of war; that leaders of vision shall be more interested in civilizing militarists than in militarizing civilians; and that peoples shall live as members of one family, cooperating in all that makes for efficiency, freedom, and happiness.

We must educate for world concept if we are to bring the world to the high plane of our cherished dreams and fond desires where—

"The common sense of most shall hold a fretful realm in awe,
And the kindly earth shall slumber, lapped in universal law."

The Chaplain, Rev. ZeBarney T. Phillips, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, who turnest the hearts of the children unto the fathers and hast declared that the righteous shalt be had in everlasting remembrance, be graciously pleased to sanctify to this Nation the influence of Thy servant, George Washington, as we commemorate the anniversary of his birth and pay loving tribute to his character and the genius of his leadership in the founding of our Republic.

In this our day of opportunity bestow upon us those noble qualities of manhood reflected in his life that we, too, may be valiant without ambition, confident without assumption, discreet without fear, resourceful in danger, resolute in adversity, triumphant in faith. We invoke Thine especial blessing upon the President of the United States, the Vice President, the Members of the Congress, and all others in authority, that they may so lead and direct the people of our land that when we shall have served Thee in our generation we may be gathered to our fathers, having the testimony of a good conscience, in favor with Thee our God, and in perfect charity with all mankind. CEREMONIES IN COMMEMORATION OF TWO HUNDREDTH ANNIVERSARY OF WASHINGTON'S BIRTH

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, under the arrangements which have been made for the joint session of the two Houses in commemoration of the two hundredth anniversary of the birth of George Washington, I understand the Senate is to leave its Chamber promptly at 11.35 a. m. Our hats and coats will be taken over and placed on a rack outside of the Hall of the House of Representatives, so that those Senators who desire, after the conclusion of the exercises in the House, to march to the front of the Capitol for the purpose of witnessing the ceremonies there and listening to the music, will have their coats and hats at hand and will not find it necessary to return to the Senate. I do not know of anything else that is to be done this morning.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Under the order heretofore made, the Senate will now proceed to form in line in order to march to the House of Representatives.

Mr. SMITH. At what time are we supposed to be in the Chamber of the other House?

The VICE PRESIDENT. We are supposed to leave here at 11.35 a. m.

At 11 o'clock and 30 minutes a. m. the Senate, preceded by its Sergeant at Arms and Secretary and headed by the Vice President and the Chaplain, together with the committee on arrangements on the part of the Senate, consisting of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS], the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CAPPER], and the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], proceeded to the Hall of the House of Representatives to take part in the joint session of the two Houses held in commemoration of the two hundredth anniversary of the birth of George Washington.

At the expiration of the ceremonies in the House of Representatives the Senate, under the order previously entered, stood adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, February 23, 1932, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 22, 1932

The House was called to order by the Speaker at 11.30 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Blessed be the Lord and the God of our fathers, from everlasting even to everlasting. In Thy holy providence we wait this hour to render our tributes of praise and gratitude to the memory of him whose heart and mind are the propulsive forces of our national existence. We pray that the youth of our land may be inspired by the recital of his sacrificial and heroic deeds as the fundamentals of free and representative government are condensed in him. May the patriotism of our entire citizenship flame forth these days in response to his spirit—the ideal master for the student, the ideal general for the dauntless soldier, and the ideal citizen for all brave patriots. Heavenly Father, do Thou lift the mantles that make for mental drabness and soul darkness. Let the lessons of this day touch every fireside, every hamlet, and every schoolhouse, and may they feel the wonder value of that contribution he made to all humanity. While empires rise and fall, while palaces and altars go down together he will still live and travel with the future years.

Almighty God, let Thy kingdom come—Thy kingdom of righteousness and peace; not the trumpet, not the banner, not the armed host but the kingdom of brotherhood. Out of the darkness bring forth the light, out of tears bring forth gladness, and out of the world's groans bring forth the songs of deliverance. Expel from all lands the misereres and the requiems, and let the whole realm rejoice together. Unstop the ears of the nations, and may they hear the witnesses of the centuries. They tell us that righteousness and not the sword is the fruit of the vision of God, and that His order for the whole earth is fraternity and not the ravages of conquest. In the name of the Prince of Peace. Amen.

By unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal was postponed until a later hour in the day.

Not only all America and all Americans, wherever found, but most countries throughout the world are paying tribute to-day to the memory of George Washington. It is proper that this program begin in the Capital of his country, in the city that bears his name. It is eminently fitting and appropriate that it should be opened by the present head of the Government of which Washington is known as the father and was the first President. To those in this official assembly and to those listening in two hemispheres, I present the President of the United States. [Applause.]

ADDRESS OF THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES

President HOOVER. The Senate, the House of Representatives, and my fellow citizens, just 100 years ago in this city Daniel Webster, in commemoration of the birth of George Washington, said:

A hundred years hence other disciples of Washington will celebrate his birth with no less of sincere admiration than we now commemorate it. When they shall meet, as we now meet, to do themselves and him that honor, so surely as they shall see the blue summits of his native mountains rise in the horizon, so surely as they shall behold the river on whose banks he lived, and on whose banks he rests, still flowing on toward the sea, so surely may they see, as we now see, the flag of the Union floating on top of the Capitol; and then, as now, may the sun in his course visit no land more free, more happy, more lovely than this, our own country.

[Applause.]

The time that Webster looked forward to is here. We "other disciples of Washington" whom he foresaw are gathered to-day. His prophecy is borne out, his hope fulfilled. That flag "still floats from the top of the Capitol." It has come unscathed through foreign war and the threat of internal division. Its only change is the symbol of growth. The 13 stars that Washington saw, and the 24 that Webster looked upon, now are 48. The number of those who pay loyalty to that flag has multiplied tenfold. The respect for it beyond our borders, already great when Webster spoke a hundred years ago, has increased—not only in proportion to the power it symbolizes but even more by the measure in which other peoples have embraced the ideals for which it stands. To Webster's expression of hope we may reasonably answer, Yes—"The sun in its course visits no land more free, more happy, more lovely than this, our own country." Proudly we report to our forefathers that the Republic is more secure, more constant, more powerful, more truly great than at any other time in its history.

To-day the American people begin a period of tribute and gratitude to this man whom we revere above all other Americans. Continuing until Thanksgiving Day they will commemorate his birth in every home, every school, every church, and every community under our flag.

In all this multitude of shrines and forums they will recount the life history and accomplishments of Washington. It is a time in which we will pause to recall for our own guidance, and to summarize and emphasize for the benefit of our children, the experiences, the achievements, the dangers escaped, the errors redressed—all the lessons that constitute the record of our past.

The ceremonial of commemorating the founder of our country is one of the most solemn that either an individual or a nation ever performs; carried out in high spirit it can be made one of the most fruitful and enriching. It is a thing to be done in the mood of prayer, of communing with the spiritual springs of patriotism, and of devotion to country. It is an occasion for looking back to our past, for taking stock of our present, and, in the light of both, setting the compass for our future. We look back that we may recall those qualities of Washington's character which made him great, those principles of national conduct which he laid down, and by which we have come thus far. We meet to reestablish our contact with them, renew our fidelity to them.

From this national revival of interest in the history of the American Revolution and of the independence of the United States will come a renewal of those inspirations which strengthened the patriots who brought to the world a new concept of human liberty and a new form of government.

So rich and vivid is the record of history, that Washington in our day lives again in the epic of the foundation of the Republic. He appears in the imagination of every succeeding generation as the embodiment of the wisdom, the courage, the patience, the endurance, the statesmanship, and the absence of all mean ambition, which transformed scattered communities of the forest and the frontiers into a unity of free and independent people.

It is not necessary for me to attempt a eulogy of George Washington. That has been done by masters of art and poetry during more than a hundred years. To what they have said I attempt to make no addition.

The true eulogy of Washington is this mighty Nation. He contributed more to its origins than any other man. The influence of his character and of his accomplishments has contributed to the building of human freedom and ordered liberty, not alone upon this continent but upon all continents. The part which he played in the creation of our institutions has brought daily harvest of happiness to hundreds of millions of humanity. The inspirations from his genius have lifted the vision of succeeding generations. The definitions of those policies in government which he fathered have stood the test of 150 years of strain and stress.

From the inspiration and the ideals which gave birth to this Nation there has come the largest measure of liberty that man has yet devised. So securely were the foundations of this free Government laid that the structure has been able to adapt itself to the changing world relations, the revolutions of invention and the revelations of scientific discovery, the fabulous increase of population and of wealth, and yet to stand the kaleidoscopic complexities of life which these changes have brought upon it.

What other great, purely human institution, devised in the era of the stagecoach and the candle, has so marvelously grown and survived into this epoch of the steam engine, the airplane, the incandescent lamp, the wireless telephone, and the battleship?

If we are to get refreshment to our ideals from looking backward to Washington, we should strive to identify the qualities in him that made our Revolution a success and our Nation great. Those were the qualities that marked Washington out for immortality.

We find they were not spectacular qualities. He never charged with a victorious army up the capital streets of a conquered enemy. Excepting only Yorktown and Trenton, he won no striking victories. His great military strength was in the strategy of attrition, the patient endurance of adversity, steadfast purpose unbent by defeat. The American shrine most associated with Washington is Valley Forge, and Valley Forge was not a place of victory—except the victory of Washington's fortitude triumphant above the weakness and discouragement of lesser men. Washington had courage without excitement, determination without passion.

The descriptions of George Washington by his contemporaries give us no clear picture of the inner man, the Washington whose spiritual force so palpably dominated his whole epoch. As a mirror, his own writings do him indifferent justice, whilst the writings of others are clouded by their awe or are obscured by their venom. We must deduce mainly from other records why he stood out head and shoulders above all the crowd around him. It was an extraordinary crowd, living at white heat, comprising men as varied, as brilliant, as versatile as the extraordinary demands which the times made upon them. They were men flexible in intellect and versed in the ways of the world. Yet in every crisis, and for every rôle, they turned to Washington. They forced upon him the command of Indian fighters; they made him a general against trained British troops; they demanded that he be a constitutionalist and a national statesman; they insisted he must guide his country through the skillful ambushes of European kings; they summoned him to establish the nonexistent credit of an insolvent infant nation. Why did his brilliant fellow patriots always thus turn to him?

The answer of history is unmistakable: They brought their problems to Washington because he had more character, a finer character, a purer character, than any other man of his time. In all the shifting pressures of his generation all men acknowledged that the one irresistible force was the overwhelming impact of his moral power. Motives and men were measured by their stature when standing in his shadow. Slander fell harmless before him, sham hung its head in shame, folly did not risk to look him in the face, corruption slunk from his presence, cowardice dared not show its quaking knees.

In his integrity all our men of genius in his day found their one sure center of agreement. In his wisdom and authority they found the one sure way to practical fulfillment of their dreams.

We need no attempt at canonization of George Washington. We know he was human, subject to the discouragements and preplexities that come to us all. We know that he had moments of deepest anxiety. We know of his sufferings, and the sacrifices and anguish that came to him. We know of his resentment of injustice and misrepresentation. And yet we know that he never lost faith in our people.

Nor have I much patience with those who undertake the irrational humanizing of Washington. He had, indeed, the fine qualities of friendliness, of sociableness, of humanness, of simple hospitality; but we have no need to lower our vision from his unique qualities of greatness, or to seek to depreciate the unparalleled accomplishments of the man who dominated and gave birth to the being of a great nation.

What we have need of to-day in this celebration is to renew in our people the inspiration that comes from George Washington as a founder of human liberty, as the father of a system of government, as the builder of a system of national life.

It is of primary importance that we of to-day shall renew that spark of immortal purpose which burned within him, shall know of the resolution and the steadfastness which carried him forward to the establishment of a nation. That establishment was not a momentary flash of impulse, in a people rebellious and passionate under oppression, destined to fade into the chaos so often born of revolutions. On the contrary, it was builded upon foundations of principles and ideals which have given the power and strength that made this Nation and inspired the establishment of ordered liberty in a score of other nations.

We have need to refresh to the remembrance of the American people the great tests and trials of character of the men who founded our Republic. We have need to remember the fiber of those men who brought to successful conclusion the eight years of Revolution. We have need again to bring forth the picture of the glories and the valor of Lexington and Concord, of Bunker Hill, the suffering and fortitude of Valley Forge, the victory of Yorktown. We have need to revive the meaning and the sheer moral courage of the Declaration of Independence, the struggles of the Continental Congress, the forming of the Constitution. We have need at all times to review the early crises of the Republic, the consolidation of the Union, the establishment of national solidarity, the building of an administration of government, and the development of guaranties of freedom. No incident and no part in these great events, which have echoed and reechoed throughout the world for a century and a half, can be separated from the name and the dominant leadership of George Washington.

Upon these foundations of divine inspiration laid by our forefathers, and led by Washington, our Nation has builded up during this century and a half a new system of life, a system unique to the American people. It is hallowed by the sacrifice and glorious valor of men. It is assured by a glorious charter of human rights.

It comprises a political system of self-government by the majority, resting upon the duties of individual men to the community, and of the local communities to the Nation. It is a government designed in spirit to sustain a dual purpose: to protect our people among nations by great national power, and to preserve individual freedom by local self-government.

It comprises a social system free of inherited position, based upon the ideal of equality of all men before the law, the equal privilege of men to strive and to achieve, and the responsibilities of men to their neighbors.

It embraces an economic system based upon the largest degree of freedom and stimulation to initiative and enterprise which can be permitted and still maintain the ideal of equality of opportunity among men.

Finally, it embraces a system of relationships to other nations based upon no thought of imperialism, no desire to dominate; a determined national self-reliance in defense and independence in action; freedom from all commitment to the unknown future; and an aspiration to promote peace and good will among all men. [Applause.]

Perhaps no single part of this system is different from some instance in history or in some other part of the world. But in its composite form it is distinctly unique and distinctly American, a system under which we have reached an assured position among the most powerful of the nations of the world.

This destiny of national greatness was clearly foreseen by George Washington. More fully than any man of his time was he gifted with vision of the future. He spoke habitually of the "American Empire," and predicted its expansion from ocean to ocean. He planned and wrought for the binding forces of transportation and peaceful commerce. He thought in terms of almost imperial grandeur, and he wrought in terms of republican solidity. His far-flung dreams have come true, and he lives to-day in his works, in the names of our towns or cities and our States, and in the affectionate reverence of us who so immeasurably benefit by his wisdom.

Our American system of national life is dependent upon a trust in the principles of government as established by George Washington; a trust in his example to our people; a trust in and a devotion to religious faith, which he himself so devoutly practiced; a trust in that divine inspiration which he so sedulously invoked and which is expressed in the common mind of our people; and above all a trust in the divine Providence which has always given guidance to our country.

From Washington's spirit there has grown an infusion of social ideals with the quality of magnanimity—upholding prosperity with generosity, dignity with forbearance, security without privilege, which has raised our institutions to a level of humanity and nobility nowhere else attained.

We have the faith that Webster expressed, that a hundred years hence our countrymen will again celebrate his birth, will review the memory of his services with no less sincere admiration and gratitude than we now commemorate it, and that they, too, will see, as we now see, "the flag of the Union floating on the top of the Capitol." [Applause.]

From the room where I conduct my high office I hourly see the monument which Washington's proud and grateful countrymen have raised to his memory. It stands foursquare to the world, its base rooted steadfast in the solid substance of American soil. Its peak rises toward the heavens with matchless serenity and calm. Massive in its proportions, as was the character of Washington himself, overwhelming in its symmetry, simplicity, and sincerity, it most fittingly, beautifully, and nobly proclaims the founder of our Commonwealth and our acceptance of his faith. Around that monument have grown steadily and surely the benevolent and beneficent agencies of orderly government dedicated to the spirit of Washington.

Beyond any other monument built by the hand of man out of clay and stone, this shaft is a thing of the spirit. Whether seen in darkness or in light, in brightness or in gloom, there is about it a mantle of pure radiance which gives it the aspect of eternal truth. It is a pledge in the sight of all mankind, given by Washington's countrymen, to carry forward the continuing fulfillment of his vision of America. [Applause.]

The VICE PRESIDENT. The assembly will rise and sing "The Star-Spangled Banner."

"The Star-Spangled Banner" was sung by the audience lead by the Interstate Male Chorus.

[During the afternoon session of the House to-day Mr. RAINEY asked and obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD the proceedings at the exercises on the Capitol steps, which are here published in full as follows:]

ORDER OF EXERCISES AT EAST FRONT OF UNITED STATES CAPITOL, FEBRUARY 22, 1932, AT 12.45 P. M.

Assemblage called to order by Dr. George C. Havenner, executive vice chairman of the District of Columbia George Washington Bicentennial Commission.

The executive vice chairman presented Dr. Cloyd Heck Marvin, chairman of the District of Columbia George Washington Bicentennial Commission, who was introduced as presiding officer.

Upon the arrival of the President of the United States, "Hail to the Chief" was played by the massed bands of the United States Army, United States Navy, and United States Marine Corps, conducted by Lieut. Commander John Philip Sousa.

At a signal given by the President the entire assemblage joined in the singing of "America." A national and international radio hook-up made possible the simultaneous singing of this hymn all over the United States and abroad. Chief among the singing units were 10,000 Washington school children and adult chorus of 2,000. Conductor, Dr. Walter Damrosch. Accompaniment by the massed bands of the United States Army, United States Navy, and United States Marine Corps.

ADDRESS OF WELCOME BY DR. LUTHER H. REICHELDERFER, PRESIDENT BOARD OF COMMISSIONERS OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Doctor REICHELDERFER. Mr. President and fellow citizens, my task to-day, although brief, is none the less a privileged one, as we stand here at the heart of the Government to commemorate the two hundredth anniversary of the birth of George Washington.

Here in enduring stone and standing foursquare to every storm, is the temple of our political liberties, the expression in objective and visible form of those principles of liberty and self-government which Washington gave to our Nation and through our Nation to all the world. No more fitting place could be found for this solemn commemoration.

My duty to-day is the more pleasant because of the intimate partnership between the Federal and District of Columbia Governments. As a representative of what Washington himself liked to call the Federal City, I welcome to these ceremonies all those who have come here to-day to honor the founder of our Capital City, not only our fellow Americans from far and near, but the sojourners within our gates from foreign shores. The lesson which Washington taught us is larger than mere local boundaries, and we desire nothing narrow or restricted in the scope and spirit of the celebration here in this city which honors Washington's memory by its very name.

Everything about him was big, broad, national, indeed, international and universal in its appeal. So we are glad to have such a diversified and cosmopolitan assemblage for these opening exercises. We ask all the world to join in this bicentennial festival and to rejoice with us to-day. In that spirit the National Capital greets you and bids you welcome.

ADDRESS OF HON. JAMES M. BECK, OF PENNSYLVANIA

Mr. BECK. Mr. President and my fellow citizens, it is a gracious impulse, inspired by sentiments of pious gratitude, which has to-day brought these thousands to the Capital of the Nation to honor the birthday of Washington. Such a ceremonial is a sacred debt to the dead, a like duty to the unborn, and the living generation can gain fresh inspiration and courage in these trying times by recalling his character and achievements. To-day, as always, his character is "as the shadow of a great rock in a weary land." It is our noblest heritage.

I am greatly honored in being asked to interpret, in a few words, the spirit of the occasion. I shall attempt no formal eulogy. The eloquent tribute to the memory of Washington which has just been made in the Halls of Congress by his lineal successor in the great office of President of the United States makes any other eulogy of Washington on this occasion an idle superfluity. Indeed, any eulogy must be inadequate, for the immortal substance of his reputation defies definition, and posterity contents itself by saying, with Abraham Lincoln: "In solemn awe pronounce his name, and in its naked, deathless splendor, leave it shining on."

The fame of Washington is as a fixed star, whose benignant rays will illuminate the ages for uncounted centuries to come. He belongs to the few among mortal men whose fame is timeless.

Ordinarily, it is presumptuous for a living generation to anticipate, as to any character in history, the judgment of posterity. Reputations come and go. Those that may seem great and lasting for a century or more too soon become as those airy streaks of cloud which, with the first breath of a new morning, "fade into the infinite azure of the past."

Walking once in Westminster Abbey, where kings and queens are mingled in the promiscuity of death, a verger told me that Dean Stanley had had a long search for the grave of a king who had been buried in some former century with pomp and circumstance. It recalls the sad comment of Edmund Burke: "What shadows we are and what shadows we pursue."

The Greeks of the classic age realized the presumption of such anticipations of posterity when they condemned Phidias to prison for sacrilege because he had sought to perpetuate his name by furtively chiseling his own image upon the shield of Minerva. And if this were true in simpler days, it is even more true in this age of crowded and fast-speeding wonders, when, as the collective power of civilization waxes, the individual wanes. "The best of this kind are but shadows." It thus becomes increasingly hazardous to assign to any man a place among the immortals.

And yet there is born each century a man of whom it can be safely said that his fame defies that never-ending stream of time which washes away the dissoluble substance of temporary reputations. Such a man is Washington. The ages have enthroned him in the great arena of history as a Homeric king of men, and before him the unending generations pass with the salutation, "Morituri, te salutamus." His preeminence can be tested by the fact that if the wise and good of all the cultural nations of our present civilization were asked to select the three noblest characters of history, the name of Washington would be on almost every list. Name another of whom this could be said.

It can be said of few men, moreover, that they were the founders of a state, for these mighty organisms rarely evolve from the predominant work of one man. There have, however, been a few such founders—Alexander, Cæsar, Charlemagne, and Napoleon. Their empires have all vanished, but the great Republic, which Washington founded, and which is his noblest monument, remains, and will remain as long as his people are faithful to his ideals of government. Never before was its power so great or its prestige so resplendent. Its star is still ascendant in the constellation of the nations, for who can ignore the momentous shifting of the world's center of gravity in the past 50 years. To those ancient seats of power on the Nile, the Tiber, the Danube, the Rhine, the Seine, and the Thames can now be added the Hudson and the Potomac. As the Republic grows in power and majesty, the fame of Washington becomes more resplendent.

To exert a beneficent influence in the councils of civilization the Republic need only follow his wise advice, as eloquently set forth in that noblest testament that the founder of a state ever gave to his people, the immortal Farewell Address. Speaking "as an old and affectionate friend," not only to his generation but to all that were to follow in the tide of time, Washington advised his people not to implicate themselves "in the ordinary vicissitudes of European politics or the ordinary combinations and collisions of her friendships and enmities." His reiteration of the word "ordinary" is most significant. It implies that in extraordinary crises of civilization America should not pursue a policy of isolation but should assume its due share of the collective responsibility of nations for the maintenance of peace through justice. He would still recognize that elemental forces infinitely greater than political institutions have united the once scattered nations into a world community of purpose and action.

He believed that America should be a helpful member in the family of nations, but without sacrificing its independence in decision and action by any entangling alliance. Such would be his policy to-day, for, to quote his own words, he would have us "independent of all and under the influence of none."

He gave us the shining ideal and ultimate objective of our foreign policy in urging us always "to give mankind the magnanimous and too novel example of a people always guided by an exalted justice and benevolence."

As all great and noble soldiers, he deprecated war, except as a last resort, and yet regarded it as preferable to a craven acquiescence in injustice, for in accepting the command of our Army he announced his belief that even peace could be too dearly purchased. When he delivered his second inaugural address in December, 1793, the world was, to quote his own words, "in an uproar," and the difficult task of the United States was, as he then said, to "steer safely between Scylla and Charybdis." Recognizing that perpetual peace could never come while the spirit of injustice remained, he solemnly warned his Nation "not to indulge a persuasion that, contrary to the order of human events, they will forever keep at a distance those painful appeals to arms with which the history of every other nation abounds." And he solemnly added:

> There is a rank due to the United States among nations which will be withheld, if not absolutely lost, by the reputation for weakness. If we desire to avoid insult, we must be able to repel it; if we desire to secure peace, one of the most powerful instruments of our rising prosperity, it must be known that we are at all times ready for war.

He never believed, however, that preparations for war would alone insure peace. With nations, as with individuals, peaceful relations must in the last analysis depend upon a mutual spirit of "good faith and justice." Therefore, he urged that we should at all times observe such "good faith and justice towards all nations [and] cultivate peace and harmony with all." To observe that policy in its letter and spirit is to be true to Washington, to ourselves; and if we are thus true, we can not then be false to any nation.

He would have welcomed the present noble effort of the nations to insure peace by an equitable limitation of arms, with its resulting growth in the spirit of amity, for the last letter he ever wrote contained the declaration that it was "time to sheath the sword of war and give peace to mankind"; but he had no illusions as to its possibility until all nations had a sincere desire for justice as the only basis of peace. Let us to-day reverently thank the God of our fathers not only for the words and deeds of Washington but for the lasting inspiration of his noble character. It illuminates, as none other, the very soul of America. From his simple grave in Mount Vernon he still guides the destinies of the American people. When the seas are smooth we may little feel his presence and sometimes are unmindful of his wise admonitions; but when the ship of state plunges into a storm and is threatened by angry seas his mighty shade is again in our consciousness as the true and eternal helmsman of the Republic.

There is a painting by the great English artist, Burne-Jones, which depicts the closing incident of that Arthurian saga which embodies the chivalry of our English-speaking race. The picture reveals King Arthur upon his deathbed at Avalon. Over a couch hangs his sword with which he had defended his people, and beside the bed stands a trumpeter who, if ever England were in desperate need, would sound his trumpet, at whose call King Arthur would rise again from his couch of death in defense of his nation.

Our Arthur—bravest of the brave and knightliest of the knightly—sleeps at Mount Vernon, but whenever disaster menaces our institutions the American people again become conscious of his potent influence, for "the path of the just is as a shining light, which shineth more and more unto the perfect day."

AFTER THE RECESS

The recess having expired, at 2 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m. the House was called to order by the Speaker.

THE JOURNAL

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday last was read and approved.

THE HUNGARIAN NATION

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communication:

BUDAPEST, February 21—10.40 a. m.

JOHN N. GARNER,
Speaker of the House, Washington, D. C.:

On behalf of the Hungarian House of Representatives I am sending to you and the House our most sincere wishes on the occasion of Washington's bicentennial. The Hungarian nation never will forget the assistance your country rendered Hungary in its hardest times.

LADISLAS ALMASY,
President of the House.

GEORGE WASHINGTON

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, inasmuch as this day is devoted largely to the memory of George Washington, I ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD an article on George Washington by ex-President Coolidge.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following:

[From the Philadelphia Inquirer, February 21, 1932]

GEORGE WASHINGTON

(One day during Mr. Coolidge's first term in the White House he was asked what books he had been reading.

"Books about Washington," was Mr. Coolidge's reply.

The first President, he explained, was primarily a business man. He was a practical executive. He deliberately planned for this country a great industrial and commercial future.

Mr. Coolidge had succeeded to Washington's job. Therefore he was studying Washington's plans and policies. He felt that in following them the United States had never gone wrong.

Those who have studied Mr. Coolidge's administration may see in this article how strongly his own policies were affected by his study.

We asked Mr. Coolidge to write on those phases of Washington which have meant much to him and which have been too little understood by the general public, and he has done so. On this celebration of the two hundredth anniversary of Washington's birth, coming, as it does, in a time of economic difficulties, Mr. Coolidge's picture of the business genius of the founder of the Republic takes on new interest and significance.)

By Calvin Coolidge

The careful study of the life of George Washington has an intensely practical purpose. We want to know what he thought and what he did in order that we may be the better able to determine what we ought to think and do now at this difficult time. We shall find it providential that the course of our Nation was largely directed in our formative period by a man who was so human, so devoted to establishing a government of the people, and so experienced in private business that he was able to apply sound business sense to the promotion of the public welfare.

The celebration of the bicentennial of the birth of the first American, which occurs on the 22d of February of the present year, should, of course, include a proper estimate of him as a great statesman and a great soldier. It is in that character that we have come to think of him. He was both, and as such is entitled to all the praise that can be lavished upon him by the most eloquent. But that is not enough. It does not tell us of the real man nor give us any insight into how he became great. We shall fail in the most desirable comprehension of him unless we turn to the more practical examination of his growth and development and try to learn how to do things by finding out how he did them.

There are two kinds of biography which fall short of giving their readers the help which should be secured from an acquaintance with great men. Some of them endow their subjects with all virtue and all wisdom. Such characters appear removed from the reach of common people. They may admire and worship, but they do not feel any kinship. They gain only the impression of a superior being dwelling apart from his fellow men. It would seem almost sacrilege to attempt to imitate him or hope to be like him. Others, proceeding in an opposite direction, represent great men as devoid of most good qualities who have reached the positions they held by being crafty and successful impostors. They are made to appear unworthy of credit or admiration and left to the inference that all greatness is a sham and a pretense. The logical conclusion is meant to be that there are no heroes and nothing is holy. Neither one of such portrayals is in accord with human nature or the truth.

George Washington was well born. His father was a mature man nearing the forties and his mother was a young woman in the twenties. Neither of his parents had any place by reason of artificial rank or title, but they belonged to that great and strong aristocracy which ennobles itself by the power of its own achievements. They were both people of the world. Tradition has it that they first met in London, where the father was accustomed to go on his business of a successful Virginia planter.

It was a serious household into which this boy came. The young mother read the Bible and Matthew Hale's Contemplations and Meditations. At a very early age her son appears to have been provided with a book of sermons. Of course, membership in the church and regular religious worship were the practice of the family. Faith was a reality in the Washington home. The Bible, the church, the sermons of pious men were all a source of inspiration for the practical affairs of everyday life.

While we do not know much of the details of the early education of Washington, we know enough to inform us on the development of his mind and character. In common with the times, his spelling was indifferent and his grammar insufficient. But he was proficient in writing and in figures. Form and numbers came naturally to him. In every sense he was a normal and fun-loving boy, but the loss of his father when he was but 11 perhaps increased his seriousness of mind. It was the practical application of what he was learning even in his early youth that stamped him as remarkable. The forms of business transactions, the precepts of correct deportment, as well as his arithmetic, which he pored over at school, were all instructions to him for the conduct of his daily life. In all things he became methodical and was always making plans for future action, whether it was the cultivation of his plantations or the freedom and government of his country. He educated himself to know how to plan and how to do—to be an executive.

Although the Virginia of the first half of the eighteenth century had many of the aspects of a frontier, constant contact with Europe made it a home of many cultured people. The father of Washington when a boy spent 12 years in England. He sent the two elder brothers of George to Oxford. He might have followed had his father lived. As it was, he had the instruction of an English schoolmaster, and later of a Huguenot clergyman, who taught him the graces of polite society. His youthful copybooks show that he was trained and trained in these things until he became proficient. There was no accident and no miracle, but just hard work.

The death of his father left him with the slender portion that customarily went to a younger son. All about him lay an uncharted wilderness. To bring land under order and law and advance his own fortunes he became a surveyor. His expeditions into distant woodlands in charge of a squad of men, where they must shelter and feed themselves for weeks at a time, the necessity for methodical accuracy involved in the undertaking, were the finest kind of preparation for his future campaigns. He learned how to estimate distance and location and see the military possibilities of wide reaches of country.

Likewise, Washington became a soldier by personal contact and painstaking study. After about the age of 17 he lived much at Mount Vernon with his elder brother, Lawrence, who had been a captain of militia under Admiral Vernon in the Cartagena campaign and later a major and adjutant general of his district. He placed the young man under the instruction of old army officers, who taught him fencing and the manual of arms. So proficient did the pupil become that before he was 20 he was appointed a major.

The same kind of a progress accounts for his political training. His father was a member of the Virginia House of Burgesses. His brother Lawrence held the same office. On the great estate below Mount Vernon lived Sir William Fairfax, collector of customs for the district, and president of the King's council, so that in office he ranked next to the governor of the colony. A little below, George Mason had a large plantation. This neighbor was a statesman of great ability and an earnest and consistent advocate of popular rights and local self-government. While these men were somewhat older than Washington, they were his constant companions. When he was but 26 he was himself elected to the house of burgesses. He had to make a campaign to win his seat. His political career began at the bottom. For a number of years he was reelected, and had the opportunity at Williamsburg to take a prominent part in all the political action of the stirring period before the Revolution. No doubt he heard Patrick Henry make that speech which was interrupted with cries of "treason." During this time he was serving on committees, helping prepare documents and organize associations for the protection of the rights of the Colonies. In very early life Washington came to be a practical politician.

The same background appears in his business training. His father was an important business man, widely engaged in agriculture, mining iron ore, and at times took command of a sailing vessel. In those days there was little division of labor, and each estate was practically self-sustaining. Nearly everything that was necessary for food, clothing, and shelter was produced where used. Disposal of surplus made the planter his own merchant, exchanging his produce in England for what he could not raise at home. Successful operation on a broad scale of such enterprises required a man of affairs. That was the atmosphere of his early home. All through life his decisions were influenced by his great business experience.

When he was only 20 he found himself one of the executors and the residuary legatee of the will of his brother Lawrence. From that time on he had charge of all his father had left him, helped his mother care for her property, and had the management of the Mount Vernon estate of his deceased brother and ultimate ownership of it, besides his duties as major of militia and adjutant general of a district extending over a number of counties. The production of the soil, of the fisheries, of the mill, as well as the supplies for a great many servants and for a considerable force of militia, all passed through his hands.

In general culture Washington must have learned much from Thomas, Baron Fairfax, who came here in 1746 to have oversight of his vast estates which were managed by Sir William Fairfax. He was the holder of an ancient title of nobility, literary, an associate of Addison, a mature man of the world who lived and died a loyalist. He often employed the young surveyor and had him much in his company at his manor house and at his forest retreat. Washington had that rare faculty of being able to absorb what was best in the persons and things with which he came in contact and to disregard the rest. He applied himself to learning and applied his learning to living. He was a disciple of application.

Such was the preparation of George Washington, when, at the age of 21, on the last day of October, 1753, he set out to carry a letter from the Governor of Virginia to the French commander, warning him not to trespass on the country around the present city of Pittsburgh. The rest of his life belongs to history.

From this time on Washington was a leader in the great plan for the making of America. While New England wanted to be safe from attack from Canada, Virginia and her neighbors wanted to expand into the Ohio Valley. They saw it as a business venture. It was for that reason that Washington was sent to dislodge the French. That expedition started the Seven Years' War, which finally brought all of North America, except the old Spanish possessions on the south and west, under British rule. The route to the western waterways was opened to the enterprise of settlement.

Following the end of the war, in 1763, there was a dozen years of agitation concerning the taxation and commerce of the Colonies. As a man of business, responsible for much property, engaged in exports and imports, Washington grasped the full significance of events, and with a deliberation that made his decisions the final word of the people took the patriots' side. While it is impossible to say that he thus early had a plan for his country that he finally put into operation, it is a fact that all the plans of consequence thereafter adopted by the country to the end of his life were the result of his approval and support.

When he went to the Congress at Philadelphia he wore his uniform. He knew that the issues meant war and he knew that war meant independence or annihilation. It was his plan for independence, which was for long periods solely dependent on his resolution and military skill, that finally prevailed.

When peace came, turning his attention to agriculture and commerce, he saw that the regions beyond the Alleghanies could only be held by economic ties dependent on transportation. He thought a canal up the Potomac was necessary. That meant the cooperation of several States. When a convention was called for this purpose it was found to be inadequate, and was dissolved, to be replaced by a national convention, called for the purpose of establishing a Federal Government. When it met, not only because he was the leading citizen but the leading nationalist, Washington was chosen to preside over it. The result was a proposal for the Constitution and the Union. As the war could not have been won without him, so the Constitution could not have been adopted without him. The Nation has since been governed in accordance with his plan.

It is one thing for a people to go through the form of adopting a constitution, but it is quite another to put it into successful and permanent operation. Our form of government was new to human experience. All the rest of the world thought it could not last. It was inevitable and absolutely necessary for Washington to be made the first President. Without his ability, his prestige, and his character, it is probable our Government might have broken up before it had a fair start. He made it a success because of his firm belief in the principle of government. He had had enough experience so that he knew the necessity of exercising all of the sovereign authority which the new Constitution provided. But his plan was for the exercise of the authority which the people themselves had created. His constant desire was to administer their Government.

Too little emphasis has been placed on his faith in a government of the people. When, in the confusion and bankruptcy of the closing months of the Revolution, the Army started a movement to make him king, he promptly denounced it. He wanted a government of the people, but he wanted it to be a real government capable of governing. Law and order were his gospel. He sympathized with his soldiers and the people in their distress and sought to relieve them by legal means, but he would fight usurpation of a mob as readily as usurpation of a monarch.

When he took office, the most pressing requirements of the new Government and the people were financial. It was here that the sound business experience and judgment of Washington were of supreme importance. He knew how to deal with questions of taxation, commerce, and credit. For working out the details he had Hamilton as his Secretary of the Treasury, but his were the final decisions.

To provide funds, import duties, and internal-revenue taxes were levied. When some people in Pennsylvania resisted payment with force the Army was sent to execute the law. The debts of the States, contracted for national defense, were assumed. To facilitate the operations of the Treasury in collecting and disbursing funds and maintaining credit operations a national bank was established. His policy was to strengthen the National Union sufficiently to make it a complete reality without encroaching on the States. He had seen enough of the futility of a government without authority when he commanded the Army.

His foreign policy was independence, peace, justice, and neutrality. Public clamor could not induce him to become involved in the French Revolution. He signed the treaty with England that was at first so unpopular and made a treaty with Spain, opening the Mississippi, because he knew both were beneficial to our commerce.

Finally he summed up his political creed in his Farewell Address. He believed in liberty and the Union unhampered by national jealousies. He urged respect for authority and obedience to law. Education, religion, and morality he considered necessary supports of free institutions. Careful maintenance of the public credit by a sparing use of it, impartial justice to all nations, permanent alliance with none, and adequate national defense were some of the important points in the wise plan for future action which he presented to his countrymen.

Washington had a deep understanding of human nature and a profound loyalty to the truth. He had the best political judgment and was the best soldier of his time. His permanent success as a statesman was due to his ability to apply business principles to political needs. Our country has never made a mistake when following his counsel.

DEATH OF HON. SANFORD KIRKPATRICK

Mr. RAMSEYER. Mr. Speaker, I rise to announce the death of Hon. Sanford Kirkpatrick at his home in Greensboro, N. C., on the 15th day of this month. I did not learn of this until Saturday when I saw an account thereof in one of my home papers. He was born in Ohio, February 11, 1842, and moved with his parents to Wapello County, Iowa, in 1849. When the Civil War broke out he was 19 years of age. He entered the Union Army and served four years and four months. He entered the war as a private, and before the war was over he was promoted to first lieutenant. He was a brave and courageous soldier and had the admiration, respect, and affection of his comrades.

From 1887 to 1913 he was in the service of the Internal Revenue Bureau of the Treasury Department where he made a remarkable record. His duties kept him in the South most of the time. He established a home in Greensboro, N. C., but always claimed his legal residence in Wapello County, Iowa.

In the spring of 1912 he came to Iowa and announced his candidacy for the Democratic nomination for Congress from the sixth congressional district of Iowa. He was nominated and that fall was elected. He ably represented the people of this district in the Sixty-third Congress. During the World War and since, up until two years ago, he spent his winters in Washington. Many of you will remember his attendance at the daily sessions of this House during the several months of each winter that he was in Washington and the intelligence and interest with which he followed all pending legislation. His span of life was over 90 years. Mr. Kirkpatrick was a man of strong convictions, an outstanding patriot, and a devoted, tried, and true public servant. He has many friends in the district which I now have the honor to represent, who have learned with profound sorrow of his passing.

DEPARTMENTS OF STATE, COMMERCE, AND LABOR APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 9349) making appropriations for the Departments of State and Justice and for the judiciary, and for the Departments of Commerce and Labor for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. McREYNOLDS in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. For the information of the House, the Chair will state that this bill has been read up to page 121, up to the employment service, with the exception of certain portions of it which were passed over, to be taken up afterwards, one on page 36, embodying the Bureau of Prohibition, which goes over until to-morrow by unanimous consent, and others, on page 49, line 19; page 51, commencing with line 23, and ending on page 52 with line 18; and on page 101, line 14, and ending with line 25 on page 113. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

United States Southwestern Reformatory—Maintenance: For the United States Southwestern Reformatory, including not to exceed $139,857 for salaries and wages of all officers and employees and not to exceed $2,000 for the construction of buildings in accordance with the provisions of "An act for the establishment of a United States Industrial Reformatory," approved January 7, 1925 (U. S. C., title 18, sec. 832), to be expended under the direction and upon the written order of the Attorney General, or his authorized representative, by contract or purchase of material and hire of labor and services and utilization of labor of United States prisoners, as the Attorney General may direct, $700,000, to be immediately available and to remain available until expended: Provided, That the total sum to be expended for such purposes shall not exceed $3,000,000: Provided further, That the Secretary of the Treasury, if in his discretion it would be impracticable to cause the plans, drawings, designs, specifications, and estimates for the remodeling and construction of the necessary buildings to be prepared in the Office of the Supervising Architect of the Treasury Department, and the work of remodeling and constructing the said buildings to be supervised by the field force of said office, may contract for all or any portion of such work to be performed by such suitable person or firm as he may select.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. UNDERWOOD: Page 50, line 9, after "$700,000," insert "no part of said sum to be used or expended for the payment of prison labor."

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, on that I reserve the point of order.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I know that the offering of this amendment is perhaps futile, but it is my wish to ask the distinguished chairman of the subcommittee a few questions pertaining to the appropriation here for the industrial reformatory at Chillicothe, Ohio. It so happens that this reformatory is located in my congressional district. I know the gentleman has made a careful study and survey of conditions in that section of the country. I am wondering whether he could tell me how much of these appropriations has been expended for the employment of free labor.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. More than $400,000.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Also, whether or not the gentleman thinks it would be the part of wisdom during these abnormal times, with the unemployment existing in our country, to finish the construction work at Chillicothe by contract instead of using prison labor as extensively as we have in the past?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, the subcommittee held extensive hearings on that. It was the opinion of the subcommittee that prison labor should be continued at this site because it was required by the substantive law which authorized the prison to be built. This was authorized back in 1929, and the original act authorizing the building of the prison provides:

For the purpose of construction of such buildings the Attorney General shall employ the labor of such United States prisoners confined in the United States Penitentiary, Atlanta, Ga., the United States Penitentiary, Leavenworth, Kans., the United States Penitentiary, McNeil Island, Wash., and State or Territorial prisons, penitentiaries, or reformatories who are eligible for confinement in said United States industrial reformatory under the provisions of this act and who can be used, under proper guard, in the work necessary to construct the buildings.

This is the bill that was before the Judiciary Committee for consideration in 1928. Mr. Foster, of Ohio, who was then at the head of the prison service, was asked and answered questions as follows:

And your idea was to get $100,000 or $150,000 per year over a 10-year period and to have it built by prison labor?

Yes.

So it would perhaps work up to over $900,000 for a 10-year period?

Yes; with first offenders, excluding the crimes of murder, arson, rape, etc.

It is interesting to note how the appropriations were made, carrying out the original purpose Congress had in mind. They first appropriated $100,000 to build a brick kiln, so that the boys confined there could make their own brick. The gentleman will remember there was opposition to it on the part of the Representatives from Ohio, but Congress voted down their protests and permitted the $100,000 to be appropriated for that purpose.

Then following that there was first carried in the deficiency act of May 29, 1928, $400,000, and that is in line with what Mr. Connor stated was his purpose, to use prison labor to construct the buildings. He said it would go on slowly. Later on, in keeping with that policy, the next appropriation, which was on January 25, 1929, carried only $150,000, and the gentleman will find again that Mr. Connor, who was then at the head of the service, made the further statement that it was the purpose to use prison labor in constructing this in line with the original authorization.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I understand that the provisions of the organic act provided that the Attorney General, whenever practicable, should use prison labor in the construction of this institution.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. No; that language was not used at all. On the other hand, the original act required that he should take prisoners from the four prisons I read and use those prisoners for the purpose of constructing these buildings. I invite your attention to the statement that was made before the Committee on Appropriations at the time the $150,000 was asked for. In speaking of the history of the institution Mr. Connor, who was then at the head of the prison service, made the statement, along with others—that when the permanent building was constructed with the necessary safeguards erected it would be possible to receive prisoners direct from the courts, and that conditions at the reformatory were such that there was ample opportunity for the employment of all prisoners who had been sent to the institution, and that when the construction begins there would undoubtedly be ample facilities for the employment of all prisoners sent to the institution in the future.

In that connection the gentleman will note that this prison is established at an old Army base or camp, and the prisoners were placed in temporary buildings, provided with a hospital and dormitories, and while housed in these buildings they were to construct new permanent quarters.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Right at that point may I interrupt the gentleman to say that I note on page 386 of the hearings, in the testimony of Mr. Bates, director of prisons, a statement in which he calls attention to the dangerous condition of the buildings in which the prison inmates are now being housed. He further directs attention to the severe criticism in the Wickersham report because of keeping prisoners at Chillicothe in fire traps. The excuse offered was that we were building permanent buildings just as quickly as we could.

The question in which I am interested is this: Does not the gentleman think it would be better to proceed at this time and finish the construction work at this institution by contract and thereby give employment to free labor that is now unemployed, and in so doing expedite the work in order to remove these conditions?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. The gentleman will find another statement that Mr. Bates made, where he emphasizes the importance of providing work for prisoners, where he says nothing is so demoralizing or hurtful to prisoners as idleness. At this prison there are 1,600 boys. They are first offenders. They are trying to rehabilitate them. They are there under a board of advisers, and on the board of advisers is the president of the American Federation of Labor, Mr. Green. Labor agreed to the terms of this bill and as to the wisdom of the declared policy for the rehabilitation of these first offenders.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I hope the gentleman will not misunderstand me. I am not criticizing the chairman of the committee or the Attorney General of the United States or the director of prisons, but I have had several complaints relative to the institution in Chillicothe using prisoners as brick masons, as carpenters, as plumbers, in competition with the skilled labor of our section of the country.

I have before me a letter from a constituent, and in part this is what he says:

Being an employee of the Government under civil service as a brick mason at the United States Reformatory, Chillicothe, Ohio, I wish to call to your attention a grievance that the convicts are constantly employed as bricklayers, causing us an unusual amount of unemployment, which seems to be quite unjust, especially during this depression period, coming as it does directly from the Department of Justice of our Government.

Now, the objection I want to make is: I think it is unfair and un-American for the Department of Justice or any other department of the Government during these abnormal times to place prisoners in direct competition with free labor, especially in the skilled occupations, such as brick masons, plumbers, steamfitters, carpenters, and other skilled mechanics.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. If the gentleman will read the hearings of the Hawes-Cooper bill and the statements that have been published within the last 30 days, explanatory of the purpose and spirit of that legislation, the gentleman will see that the American Federation of Labor acquiesces in the wisdom of the policy announced in that bill as well as other bills of this character.

In other words, they recognize that these prisoners are maintained at the expense of the people of the Nation, and that whatever the expense is, it must come out of the Federal Treasury, and that prisoners should be provided with reasonable employment. Such a policy is essential to health and to the morale of prison populations.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I thank the gentleman and agree with him in part. There is just one further proposition to which I desire to call attention.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Ohio may proceed for five additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Bates states in the hearings on page 382 that they are using prison labor for the rough work, the fetch-and-carry work. Mr. Bennett states on page 383 that in constructing the buildings as far as possible the labor of inmates has been used. In that connection, the gentleman will notice in the hearings, page 384 and I may say that Mr. Bates and Mr. Bennett in the testimony given before the gentleman's subcommittee have stated that they were using prisoners only in the rough work and not in the skilled work—but on page 384, the future policy of the Director of Prisons is stated in answer to a question by the gentleman from Alabama. I quote from the hearings:

Mr. OLIVER. How much do you contemplate paying out of the $1,671,000 which represents the balance which you say will be expended to complete the buildings?

Mr. BATES. I can answer that in this way: There is quite a little history connected with this institution. I have come to this conclusion: That it is expensive to try to combine prison labor and paid labor, so we have not thought to employ them there on one job. In this program we have turned two of these dormitory buildings over entirely to the inmates as a training project. We have picked out three of the other remaining buildings, the mess hall and kitchen, school building, and assembly hall, and we are having specifications drawn on these to let those entirely at contract.

What I want to know is if they intend to permit the prisoners to do all of the work, skilled and unskilled, on the remaining buildings that are to be constructed?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. If the gentleman will read further in the hearings he will find that I called the attention of the Attorney General and Mr. Bates to the provision of the law as to the use of prison labor and stated that while I recognized very strong pressure was brought to bear on the Attorney General to employ free labor, yet at the same time the original act did not contemplate that free labor should be used to any great extent. May I read section 5 of the original act?

That the discipline observed in said United States Industrial Reformatory shall be correctional and designed to prevent young offenders from becoming habitual criminals. It shall be the duty of the Attorney General to provide for the instruction of the inmates in the common branches of an English education and for their training in such trade, industry, or skilled vocation as will enable said inmates, upon release, to obtain self-supporting employment and to become self-reliant members of society.

For this purpose the Attorney General shall establish and maintain a common school and trade schools in said industrial reformatory, and shall have authority to promulgate all such rules and regulations for the government of the officers of said industrial reformatory and the inmates thereof as he may deem proper and necessary.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Just one more question. Here is another paragraph in the communication from which I read a moment ago. This gentleman says in part (I quote further):

Also, these convicts are not doing mechanical work as we do. When it comes to the real technical part, they build forms for them to place their brick in, which makes us feel that the Government is going a long way to keep us unemployed, when they take our work from us who have passed the civil-service test in every respect, even in character, then turn our work over to the criminal element of our country; what do you think?

Mr. Chairman, this practice is unfair to the free labor of our country. Millions of our people are unemployed; anxious and willing to work, but unable to secure employment. I am more interested in these people than the convicts within our prison walls. I know our prisoners must be employed, but these are fearful and abnormal times. The honest man, with a wife and children to support, should have our first consideration.

He has committed no intentional crime. It is we who are committing a wrong against our honest citizens by practices such as these.

If the prisoners must have exercise, perhaps we can employ a few additional physical educational instructors to take care of them. But by all means let us spend these appropriations for as much free labor as possible at this time. I am making this protest to-day hoping that as much of this appropriation as possible will be used by our distinguished Attorney General and able director of prisons for the employment of free labor. I trust that these distinguished gentlemen, according to their testimony, will "continue to resolve doubts in favor of free labor."

For this attitude I heartily commend them and urge its continuance.

I am opposed to convict labor, competing with free labor, at any and all times.

That is the part I am objecting to, if the gentleman pleases. I think it is unfair to build forms for these prisoners in order that they may compete as brick masons with free labor in our section of the country. I desire to condemn that practice as not being consistent with the provisions of the organic law for the use of prison labor on this construction work.

Mr. JENKINS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. JENKINS. I was interested in what the gentleman from Alabama had to say about the views of the Attorney General. About two years ago another Congressman and I went to see the Attorney General about this proposition. At that time we were successful in getting the Attorney General and Mr. Bates to rule that because there was a lot of technical work to be performed there that they would be free, under the law and under the organic act, to permit the employment of a lot of brick masons and a lot of carpenters. They did that for one season, but last year they again proceeded to put on the prisoners. Can the gentleman tell me why they changed their policy?

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes in order that I may explain this proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, this was the first bill that was passed for the purpose of seeking to rehabilitate prisoners in accordance with modern methods and lending real encouragement to those who had been so unfortunate as to commit first offenses. Congress was urged to establish a reformatory, and in the organic act it was provided that that reformatory should be under the control of a board of supervisors, so as to take away from it as far as possible the idea of prison life; that there should be no walls; that its population should be given vocational and practical training along many lines. The ages were fixed at between 17 and 30. Following the authorization, a fund of $100,000 was first provided for a modern brick kiln to provide brick for the construction of the buildings by the population of the reformatory. It was also provided in the organic act that the Attorney General should provide training so as to equip these boys to return to their homes fully prepared to engage in some useful trade.

When we were considering this appropriation we found that the Attorney General, naturally very sympathetic of existing conditions, may have, in response to the entreaties of the very capable Representatives from Ohio, permitted, in a larger way than the original act contemplated, the use of free labor. That matter is discussed in the hearings, and you will note that the committee thoroughly understood and sympathized with the position of the Attorney General. We knew how difficult it was to resist the persuasive appeals of the able Senators and Representatives from the State of Ohio, so the committee felt it would permit language to be carried in this bill which, while not strictly in line with the authorization act, does vest some discretion in the Attorney General as to the employment of free labor within reasonable limits if, in his judgment, it is found wise to do so.

I appreciate the attitude of the gentlemen from Ohio, and the nature of the protests filed with our good friend, who so ably represents this district; but if the House yielded to this protest it would have to yield to similar protests as to every Federal prison.

Let me say this: There is one class of hard workers who have never filed a protest against reasonable work by prisoners, even though it is in competition with their labors. It is a large class, yet the class upon which the welfare of our country basically rests—our farmers. All prisons raise vegetables and foodstuffs and operate dairies, but you have yet to hear from a single farmer a protest as to this form of prison labor. [Applause.]

I say, again, it is significant that on the board of advisers for this reformatory is the president of the American Federation of Labor, who gave approval to the legislation and who is now serving in a helpful way to rehabilitate these young men charged there with their first offense. The whole country is interested in seeing that the hand of sympathy and encouragement is extended to these lads, so that they may be well equipped when they return to their homes to take up some lawful trade.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I have often wished that when such questions are debated, as the one now raised by our friend from Ohio, and are before the House, that the wives and little helpless children of men in our penitentiaries and prison institutions could be in the gallery. I wish they could just fill the entire gallery and let us look at them while we are voting on such questions.

What are we going to do with them? Are they to be cast off into eternal darkness? Are they to be eternally damned and deemed beyond the pale of help from our Government? When their husbands and fathers are sentenced to terms of hard labor are we to keep them idle in penal institutions, well fed and well cared for, with nothing to do and no means of making a little pittance to send to their starving wives and children? Is this to be the policy of this Government?

I want to show you what some of our prisoners are doing in our Federal penitentiaries; you may not know about it. Do you know that down here at Atlanta they are making duck cloth for your mail sacks, such as the samples I now exhibit before you, but there is an agreement with the Federation of Labor that the Government can not make and furnish but 20 per cent of the mail sacks. The balance has to be made in commercial shops where union workers are employed. We could make them all, all the mail sacks our Government needs, and they are good mail sacks—the best in the world for the Government—but the American Federation of Labor will not let us. We could make them all at about one-tenth of what they cost the Government in outside mills and in outside factories, but we pay this extra cost to satisfy just such union labor contentions as my friend from Ohio is making.

Let me show you something else. Do you know that the wives and children of the men who work there get a regular remittance every month? Do you know that the husbands send their wives and little children a regular remittance so earned by them every month? Is not this worth while?

I want to show you what else they are doing. Here is a splendid shoe [indicating], a good shoe that they are making for the Army and the Navy. They can make this shoe and pay all costs and pay the prisoner who helps to make it something to send to his wife and children every month, and yet sell that shoe to the Army and Navy for $2.85. It would cost the Government $8 or $10 elsewhere. Here is a dress shoe that they make for the officers of the Army and the Navy for $3.75. This would cost you or me $12 at a store, and the man who makes this shoe sends a regular remittance home to his wife and children, and the Government saves by letting the Army and Navy buy this shoe. Look at it. It is a good shoe.

Here is a dress calf shoe.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. In a moment I will yield to my distinguished friend from Ohio, who is a most valuable man in this Congress. I want to show these things that are made by these prisoners who are behind bars. They can not sell these shoes to any other source except the Army and the Navy and our Indian Service, because organized labor has so circumscribed them that they can only make and sell certain things for Government use, and it keeps prisoners occupied, in good health, and permits them to make and send a small sum to their families each month.

They can make this shoe I now show you and pay all costs and pay the man something to send to his wife and children and sell it to the Army or the Navy at $2.60 a pair.

You know hunters pay $12 in commercial stores for this shoe to hunt in [indicating]. It is a good, stout, waterproof shoe. They make and sell this for $2.19 to the Army and Navy and the Indian Service. Why should they not do it? I say they should, and I am possibly the only Member of Congress who can preach this doctrine because the American Federation of Labor would get after you boys if you make this kind of a speech.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five additional minutes.

Mr. SWING. Reserving the right to object, will the gentleman yield to us for questions if he gets this time?

Mr. BLANTON. Certainly. That is what I want it for, to answer questions. I shall yield first to my friend from Ohio [Mr. UNDERWOOD].

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I hope the gentleman has not misunderstood the nature of my protest. I agree with the gentleman that these prisoners ought to be employed, but I object to the Government using them in skilled occupations, such as brick masons, and training them to become bricklayers and to go out and compete in an already overcrowded market for skilled laborers.

Mr. BLANTON. They should be used to build these new prison buildings.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. But the Government went there and constructed a brick, plant. In so doing, prison-made brick came in competition with the brick industry of my State and district. I did not approve of this step. I knew what it would do to private industry. I am now protesting against prison labor coming in further competition with free labor.

Mr. BLANTON. I quite agree with my distinguished friend from Ohio [Mr. UNDERWOOD] that prison labor should not be permitted to come in competition with free labor. And we do not permit prison labor to compete against free labor. We permit prison labor to make only such things as the Government must use itself.

The chairman of our committee has already pointed out that at every prison the inmates raise gardens and truck produce that they daily eat, and not a farmer has ever protested.

Does my friend know that there are many wives who stay loyal to prisoners while they are serving terms, and they are there when the man is turned out. Does anyone want them to go back to stealing again, breaking open houses again? Do you want them to commit new crimes, or do you want them to be prepared when they come out to make an honest-to-God living?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I agree with the gentleman from Texas, in part. He is a student, a scholar, and an able statesman. But has the gentleman given any consideration to the hundreds of honest men who are unemployed, and to their women and children who are facing destitution and want?

Mr. BLANTON. This Congress should do something for the unemployed. We have done entirely too much for big interests. Congress has given $2,000,000,000 to the railroads, $125,000,000 to the land banks that are still robbing the farmers in the country, and whenever I vote here in the future it is going to be for the people, the actual starving people of this country. I am going to vote for no other kind of bill for any other purpose that comes here. [Applause.] Now I will yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. SWING. The gentleman has made a very touching appeal in behalf of the wives and children of men who have been convicted of a willful violation of law. Would you have Congress establish a precedent of dealing more kindly with those than it would with the wives and children of law-abiding citizens, thousands of whom are now out of work and their families suffering because of this very competition from convict-made goods?

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, I am for the honest ones first, but I am also in favor of trying to redeem the dishonest ones.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes. I gladly yield to the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. ABERNETHY. I heard the gentleman say something about the joint land banks and the foreclosures.

Mr. BLANTON. Yes; to-day at Albany, Tex., they put a poor farmer out in the cold and took possession of his farm, worth $10,000, several times what he owed them, because he could not pay the interest on $1,500. There was the joint-stock land bank at Dallas, Tex., created to help the farmers rather than to absolutely ruin them——

Mr. ABERNETHY. Let me say this, that I have a letter from a friend. He has had his land sold by one of these joint-stock land banks.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLANTON. Now, I can not yield further, as we will discuss the land banks later.

I want to answer the gentleman from California [Mr. SWING] and the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. SCHAFER], who is so anxious to interrupt me that he can not sit still. Here is what we are going to do for honest citizens outside of penitentiaries. We are going to take over and run this Government in behalf of all the people. I have just received a telegram which is the most encouraging news I ever had in a long time.

It comes from a big convention at San Antonio, where the Battle of the Alamo was fought, and it is as follows:

SAN ANTONIO, TEX., February 22, 1932.

Hon. THOMAS L. BLANTON,
House of Representatives:

Demonstration here to-day in favor of GARNER for President. Greatest ever held in Texas. Every section of Texas and many other Southern States represented. Texas to-day gives its solid support to the GARNER-for-President movement. GARNER must be drafted by the Democracy of the country. All political leaders and the South's leading business men join me in asking this be read before your body if the time is opportune.

T. N. PICNOT.

That is the most encouraging news I have heard, because if we Democrats do draft our Speaker and he is nominated, he will be elected, and then there will be a people's rule of this Government, and it will once again be a government of the people, for the people, and by the people, and we will not have any more trouble about finding work for honest men seeking jobs or for men in penitentiaries, because there will not be so many of them in the penitentiaries; there will be a way of earning an honest living outside of them.

Mr. SCHAFER. Why will the gentleman not find so many in the penitentiaries? Does he believe that his candidate will repeal the prohibition law? [Laughter.]

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, there he goes again. There is no power here in Washington that can repeal the prohibition law. You know, my friends, the gentleman from Wisconsin would be a very valuable Member if he could get prohibition off his mind. I want to ask him a question, and I want the gentleman to tell us the God's truth. Is the gentleman a wet or a dry? [Laughter.]

Mr. SCHAFER. I am not both, like the gentleman's candidate. I am a wet.

Mr. BLANTON. All right; he is a wet. Now, let me ask the gentleman another question. Did the gentleman vote in the election in 1928 for so-called dry Mr. Hoover or wet Mr. Smith?

Mr. SCHAFER. I voted for the most favorable candidate from the wet standpoint, because the gentleman's candidate, Mr. Smith——

Mr. BLANTON. Whom did the gentleman vote for?

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Hoover.

Mr. BLANTON. That is it, you see.

Mr. SCHAFER. Let the gentleman yield until I answer the question. The gentleman's candidate for President in 1928, in his Milwaukee speech, correctly indicated that the President had no jurisdiction in repealing or amending the eighteenth amendment, and that before the repeal or modification of the Volstead Act could be acted upon by him, it would have to be passed by the Congress. He did not show any wet leadership at the Houston Democratic convention, but in his Milwaukee speech indicated he would do so if elected President.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, this is the first time I have ever found the gentleman from Wisconsin willing to agree with me. He is a fundamental wet. He can not sit still when anybody is talking dry. However, he, a wet, voted for Hoover, and I have contended all the time that Hoover is as wet as Smith or wetter. The gentleman now agrees with me and says that Hoover is wetter than Smith.

Mr. MAAS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. MAAS. I take it the candidate of the gentleman from Texas is a dry.

Mr. BLANTON. I will let my candidate declare himself in his own way.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, we have been very liberal in this debate.

Mr. BLANTON. I was through, but I wanted to answer the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for one minute.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I recognize that we are all tempted this evening to have a field day in no man's land, but we are now considering a very important bill, and it is the hope of the House that we may finish the bill not later than to-morrow evening. I have consulted Members on both sides, and find a strong sentiment that all discussion be confined to the bill. I hope Members will try to observe that admonition in the further consideration of the bill this evening.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I think the RECORD should show at this point that joint-stock land banks are not Government institutions.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate upon this section and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes.

Mr. SCHAFER. Could not I have 10 minutes in which to answer the gentleman's question on the merits of the bill, on the matter of prison labor?

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Alabama that debate upon this section and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by striking out "10 minutes" and inserting "20 minutes."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin to make it 20 minutes instead of 10 minutes.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. SCHAFER) there were—ayes 61, noes 63.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chair appointed Mr. SCHAFER and Mr. OLIVER of Alabama.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 69, noes 79.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw my motion for the time being.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. SCHAFER] may proceed for five minutes out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Chairman, I wish to thank the distinguished gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OLIVER].

Mr. Chairman, I want to briefly discuss the merits of the motion offered by my friend the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON], because in the fine city of Milwaukee, which I have the honor to represent in part, we have a great many shoe factories, as well as practically every other kind of industry. I was certainly surprised to find the gentleman from Texas acting in the capacity of salesman for prison-made shoes, when throughout the United States there are thousands, hundreds of thousands, yea millions of law-abiding American citizens walking the streets to-day unable to find employment. [Applause.]

Oh, the gentleman spoke in glowing terms about how wonderful it was for the wives and children of a convict to receive a check for the wages of that convict, perhaps a felon, who in these days of depression is working behind the walls of a penitentiary. But the gentleman failed to indicate that by reason of the work performed by those convicts which result in those checks going to their families there were just that many more wives and children of law-abiding American citizens, many of whom offered their all in time of war in the military and naval services, who do not receive a pay check because the bread-winner of the family is unable to find a position.

In these dark days of depression and unemployment we should be bending our efforts toward reducing the amount of shoes and other articles manufactured by convicts who are confined in the prisons instead of increasing it. If jobs are to be furnished through the manufacture of shoes and other products, let those law-abiding citizens have the work in preference to the convicts.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended one minute.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman have one additional minute. I want to ask him a question.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I ask permission to make a short statement.

I know everyone is anxious to get back to the bill. We have enjoyed the speeches which have just been made, and I am sure the gallery enjoyed them, but it is important that we get down to a business consideration of the items in this very important bill.

I desire to say, so that no wrong impression can possibly be had from what has been said, that this reformatory was established with the full approval of the American Federation of Labor. As stated before, the president of the American Federation of Labor is a member of the board of advisors.

This act requires that the board of advisers, before any young man is returned to his home, must make every possible effort to find lawful employment for him. The public is willing to forget the past of every young offender who leaves this institution with a good record. Those in control strive to educate and to rehabilitate these unfortunates, so that they may take their places in the honorable walks of life along with their fellows. That is the purpose of this legislation.

I want to emphasize this so that no one may gather from anything which may have been said that there has been opposition at any time on the part of organized labor to the establishment of this reformatory. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio.

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the completion of the United States hospital for defective delinquents, including the cost of purchasing a site, remodeling, constructing, and equipping the necessary buildings thereon, purchase of mechanical equipment, and all other expenses incident thereto, as authorized by the act entitled "An act to establish a hospital for defective delinquents," approved May 13, 1930 (U. S. C., Supp. V, title 18, secs. 871, 872, 880), to be expended under the direction and upon the written order of the Attorney General, by contract or purchase of material and hire of labor and services and utilization of labor of United States prisoners, as the Attorney General may direct, $775,000, to remain available until expended.

Mr. JOHNSON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Amendment offered by Mr. JOHNSON of Missouri: That the numbers "$775,000," in line 16, at page 52, be stricken out and the numbers "$1,250,000" inserted in lieu thereof.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order against the amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, in the beginning I want to say that I commend the able members of this committee for their contribution in an effort to balance the Budget of the Government. However, I feel that in cases where there is an imminent need for an increased appropriation, or where the Government is legally or morally obligated to appropriate an increased amount, there should be such increased appropriation. I have offered an amendment which seeks to increase the appropriation carried in this item from $775,000 to $1,250,000. The amendment seeks to increase the appropriation to the amount recommended by the Budget.

The item carries an appropriation for the completion of a hospital for defective delinquents located at Springfield, Mo.

In the very brief time allotted to me I can not in detail discuss this case. Summarizing, however, may I say, that in 1930 the United States Government found it had in its various penal institutions many persons who were either insane or bordering upon insanity; it also found that in such penal institutions there were large numbers of persons who were afflicted with tuberculosis and that as a matter of justice to those inmates and as a matter of economy it was expedient and necessary that they be grouped and segregated from the other prisoners. Consequently in 1930 a congressional committee was appointed. This committee made a recommendation that a hospital for defective delinquents be constructed at a cost of not to exceed $2,500,000. This hospital was to be constructed under the supervision of the Attorney General.

Under this authorization Mr. Sanford Bates, whom we heard justly lauded on the floor of this House last Saturday, prepared and circulated data in the various communities interested soliciting the donation of a site for this great improvement. I should like to call to the attention of the Congress certain statements made in the data furnished by Mr. Bates. Among such statements and representations are found the following:

Character of institution: The proposed hospital for defective delinquents, to be located in Indiana, Illinois, Iowa, or Missouri, will be used for the care and treatment of offenders against the United States who are mentally abnormal, who suffer from chronic diseases, such as tuberculosis, cancer, senility, and the like. The institution will be built by private contractors at an estimated cost of $2,500,000.

Relying upon these representations made by the United States Government, the good people of the city of Springfield, Mo., which is located in my district, combined together and raised $133,500, purchased a site for this hospital and gave it free of charge to the United States Government.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that my colleague may proceed for five additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. JOHNSON of Missouri. A contract has been let for this great improvement and the work thereon is now in progress.

Mr. Bates, Director of the Bureau of Prisons, in the Budget, realizing the imminent and emergent need of this great improvement and fully realizing the representations made by the Government to the people of Springfield, recommended that the appropriation carry $1,250,000 to complete the improvement. The committee has reduced this appropriation to $775,000. I understand they claim they have done this because they think it is not longer necessary to include within the improvement the tubercular unit of the hospital.

This institution is destined to be the most significant penal institution in the United States, because it is intended to house all of the medical penal problems of the Government. It represents the humanitarianism of our great United States in its treatment of those unfortunates who, because of mental, physical, or other causes over which they had no control, transgressed the laws of the land. Such unfortunate victims of these disturbing influences must have the humane treatment this great improvement contemplates.

Mr. Bates, before the committee, stated that there were now from 15 to 25 prisoners who were insane or bordering upon insanity in each of our Federal prisons.

He further stated, ladies and gentlemen of the Congress, that to-day there was a large number of tubercular inmates in the various prisons, and that at the Atlanta Prison they now had from 40 to 50 tubercular prisoners in tents in the yard; that in the winter those tents are all buttoned up, with an oil stove inside, and that these tubercular prisoners have to live in these tents with these oil stoves burning, and that they need better treatment. He recommended that this hospital be completed so that this humane treatment might be accorded to these defective delinquent prisoners.

Springfield is one of the leading cities, commercially and industrially, of the Middle West, located at the foothills of the Ozark Mountains, and surrounded by a great agricultural region.

This hospital is located in the greatest scenic and healthful region in the entire United States. I would like to say for the benefit of some of you Members of Congress who have not had the pleasure of sojourning for a time in this region that in the Ozark Mountain region one can always find invigorating and health-giving climate and atmosphere, and because of that condition this hospital is singularly well located for the treatment of tubercular prisoners.

I appeal to you to increase this appropriation for three reasons. First, as a matter of simple, plain economy. It will cost the Government of the United States less to equip and build a hospital with the facilities to care for tubercular patients than it will to continue the treatment of such patients in the hospitals as they are now existing.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Does the gentleman feel that the Government is morally obligated to the people of his district to go through with the promise they made when the people of his district gathered up the money to purchase the site where this hospital is to be built?

Mr. JOHNSON of Missouri. I certainly think the Government is morally obligated to fulfill that agreement and I intended to mention that in just a moment.

Mr. JOHNSON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I assume the purpose of the gentleman's amendment is to provide funds for the building of a separate tuberculosis hospital.

Mr. JOHNSON of Missouri. Yes; as included in the program.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. In other words, it is a hospital the design of which the gentleman has seen, which is separate and apart from the hospital now being constructed under contract.

Mr. JOHNSON of Missouri. That is the purpose of the amendment, for the reason that the original plans and data contemplated that.

Mr. HOPKINS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. HOPKINS. I would like at this point to get the gentleman's opinion, and particularly the opinion of the chairman of the subcommittee, as to the effect of the word "completion," where it reads "for the completion of the United States hospital," inasmuch, as the gentleman has pointed out in such a fine way, the Government did promise to build a two and a half million dollar institution and gave an implied promise and an implied contract to do that, if the citizens of that district would raise $135,000, which they did.

If the bill is passed as it is, without amendment, although I hope they will adopt the gentleman's amendment, yet is it the intention of the Committee on Appropriations to limit the cost of this hospital to the $2,025,000 which this bill will provide as the total cost?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I will state to the gentleman that I shall ask permission of the committee to make a statement about this matter. There is no authority of law for the building of a separate tuberculosis hospital, and I think this will be made clear. If later it is the desire of the Congress to build a tuberculosis hospital, that will have to be taken up with the legislative committee. Of course, they would have the right to use wards in this hospital for the purpose of placing tubercular patients there, if the Attorney General desires to do so. I do not want to take more of the gentleman's time.

Mr. HOPKINS. I was wondering whether that language meant that this was for the entire completion of the hospital.

Much has been said about the need to cut appropriations, and I, for one, am highly in favor of reducing many Government expenditures, but in this case a different issue is at stake. I want to summarize the case as presented by me and my colleagues from Missouri:

First. Congress in May, 1930, authorized a two and a half million dollar hospital for defective delinquents, mentally or physically.

Second. The Department of Justice broadcast a "statement of facts" on which many cities submitted bids. Springfield, Mo., submitted what was considered the best bid and gave $133,500 to purchase a site for this two and a half million dollar hospital. This, in my opinion, constituted an implied contract on the part of the Government to build a two and a half million dollar hospital. Not to do so at this time smacks of bad faith on the part of our Government.

Third. The testimony indicates that this two and a half million dollar hospital is needed. As a matter of fact, the Department of Justice requested $3,000,000 originally. Furthermore, the testimony shows clearly that unless this hospital is completed as requested by the Department of Justice many tubercular patients must be left at their respective prisons without regard for the danger to the lives of those hospitalized with them.

The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OLIVER] warns against the Federal Government building too fine and complete hospitals for criminals. This argument comes too late. Congress has already decided its policy, and it is not the function of the Appropriations Committee to make any changes in substantive law.

The people of Springfield accepted the promise of the Government in good faith, and I urge my colleagues at this time to vote for the amendment and carry out this agreement.

Mr. JOHNSON of Missouri. I think this increased appropriation should be made from a humanitarian standpoint. The original plan certainly contemplated, as the data of the Director of Prisons clearly show, that the tuberculosis unit would be built in this hospital.

The evidence to-day is that in the Atlanta prison there are from 40 to 50 tubercular prisoners living in tents and under insanitary arrangements, and we ought to be prompted from the humanitarian standpoint to properly build this hospital so they can have humane treatment.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Missouri. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I will ask the gentleman if it is his understanding that at the time this site was selected, the Government represented to these people that this tuberculosis hospital would be constructed, and that this $133,500 was pledged with the understanding that a tuberculosis hospital would be built in connection with the institution for defectives.

Mr. JOHNSON of Missouri. To the gentleman from Missouri I may say that certainly that was the understanding, because in the data furnished by Mr. Bates is found the following language:

> That this hospital shall be for offenders against the United States who are mentally abnormal, who suffer from chronic diseases, such as tuberculosis, cancer, senility, and the like. The institution will be built by private contractors at an estimated cost of $2,500,000.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I ask this question in view of the statement made by the chairman of the subcommittee to the effect there is no authorization by Congress for the construction of a tuberculosis hospital in connection with this institution.

Mr. DYER. If the gentleman will yield, I do not think the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OLIVER] means to say that Congress has not authority to go ahead and provide funds for the full appropriation. Legislation was enacted authorizing that.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I shall be pleased to discuss that in a few moments, and I shall answer the gentleman's question at that time.

Mr. JOHNSON of Missouri. If I may proceed now, there is to me a most impelling reason why this increased appropriation should be included in this legislation.

As has been shown, the Government of the United States in an effort to secure sites represented and promised the good people of Springfield, Mo., that if they would appropriate $133,500, the Government would construct a hospital to cost $2,500,000.

Mr. JOHNSON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes more.

Mr. DYER. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may be given five minutes more, because this is a matter that the membership should know about, because a great injustice has apparently been done to Springfield, Mo.

There was no objection.

Mr. GILCHRIST. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. GILCHRIST. I had in mind to ask the gentleman who made the promise on the part of the United States, and how it was made and where?

Mr. JOHNSON of Missouri. I thought that was clear, that it was made by Mr. Bates, Director of the Bureau of Prisons, certainly acting within the scope of his authority and under the direction of the Attorney General, in whom was lodged authority by this law to supervise the construction of this hospital. Mr. Bates prepared and circulated a paper in this community in which he stated that a tubercular unit would be built in this hospital at a cost of two and a half million dollars.

Mr. HOPKINS. And in addition Congress had made an authorization of two and a half million dollars.

Mr. JOHNSON of Missouri. That is true, Congress authorized the expenditure of two and a half million dollars.

Mr. KETCHAM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. KETCHAM. It was my good fortune this summer to be on the site where this hospital is to be constructed. It is a wonderful site, and I may say that in conversation with persons who had a considerable part in the negotiations between Springfield and Mr. Bates, there was clear understanding that the tubercular hospital was to be erected. Certainly, they are to be congratulated on the fine site that they have for the location of a hospital. [Applause.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Missouri. The good people of Springfield, Mo., relying on the representations and promises made by the Federal Government, by diligent effort and sacrifice, combined and raised $133,500 to purchase this beautiful site and turned it over to the Government free of charge.

I received a telegram to-day from the Chamber of Commerce at Springfield, Mo., in which it urges that the United States Government keep faith with the people at Springfield. [Applause.] I submit to you that the Federal Government is morally bound to increase this appropriation and construct this tubercular unit.

The good people of Springfield, Mo., are composed of as fine citizens as can be found anywhere in the world. They have kept faith, they have done their part, and I say to you that it would be a gross violation of its pledge on the part of the Federal Government to decrease this appropriation and not construct the hospital as it promised and agreed.

Mr. GARBER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. GARBER. I am not in opposition to the gentleman's amendment, but I am in opposition to the gentleman's charge that the Federal Government is under a moral obligation to carry out any implied or direct promise made by anyone, when it must have been assumed all through the negotiations that it must first have the approval of Congress.

Mr. JOHNSON of Missouri. The original act provided for a hospital to be constructed under the superintendence of the Attorney General.

Mr. DYER. If the gentleman will permit, if he will examine, he will find that the legislation placed this matter in the hands of the Attorney General.

Mr. GARBER. Let me inquire, Did the legislation place in the hands of the Attorney General the authority to appropriate this money to pay for these buildings? Certainly not.

Mr. JOHNSON of Missouri. Fair play and justice demand that the Government keep its faith and not decrease this appropriation.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have the point of order disposed of.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I was anxious that the very able gentleman from Missouri [Mr. JOHNSON] should have full opportunity to present his views relative to the recommendations of the committee. He has done so in a very lucid way, and I note the presence of the other influential Members from Missouri and among them I see a distinguished member of the Judiciary Committee who was on the committee at the time the authorization act was passed. Sometimes, you know, even Homer nods. And the learned gentleman from Missouri could not be expected to remember the provisions of the many bills reported by the Judiciary Committee nor the hearings had thereon.

You will remember I asked the gentleman who offered the amendment if it was his purpose by this amendment to provide funds for the building of a separate tubercular hospital, separate from the hospital now under construction. He said it was. I asked him also whether such tubercular hospital was some little distance from the hospital now building, and he answered it was. For that reason I reserved the point of order, because he has correctly stated the facts. I have the picture here of the hospital now under construction, and I wanted to get the gentleman's interpretation of his own amendment, because it is only when we understand what one intends that we can be sure of doing no injustice in the application of the law to the facts.

Mr. JOHNSON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Missouri. Did they not state that the purpose was to build a tubercular unit in this hospital?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. The gentleman's purpose is to build a separate tubercular unit, and he stated it was some little distance to the left of the hospital now building. At one time it was thought of locating it to the right of this building, but later it was determined to put it on the left.

Here is the picture of the hospital that the Judiciary Committee authorized to be built, and the act only authorizes one hospital. The contracts for that hospital were let last month, and it is to cost $1,710,000. When the original act authorizing the hospital now being built was before the Committee on the Judiciary, it was stated by those favoring the bill that they wanted to build a hospital with a capacity of about 550.

This hospital now under construction will have a much larger capacity than 550, and it is so well arranged that it will care not only for the insane but for the afflicted from any cause. They can well care for tubercular patients if found desirable. In other words, there are many open, well-ventilated dormitories in this hospital now building. You will have rooms for acute cases of insanity, for milder cases of insanity, for the aged, the infirm, the feeble, and the blind. You may also place in this unit of the hospital now building all of the tubercular patients, if desired.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. What part was to have taken care of the tubercular unit?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Here is the original act that was before the Committee on the Judiciary, and I call attention to it because the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DYER], who has been the capable acting chairman of this important committee so often, was no doubt present when the authorization bill was passed. The hospital was being urged for the purpose of caring for the insane, and they undertook to give to the committee the number of insane then in Federal prisons, and you will find that the wording of the bill itself relates to the insane, the feeble-minded. Nothing appears in the hearings nor in the bill as to tubercular prisoners. It referred to the insane, to the mental defectives.

The act provides that the Attorney General is authorized and directed to select a site in connection with some existing institution or elsewhere for a hospital for the treatment of all persons charged with offenses against the United States who are in the actual custody of its officers and who at the time of their conviction, or during the time of their detention or confinement, were or shall have since become insane or so afflicted with an incurable degenerative disease as to require medical attention. Then section 6 provides that there shall be a board to pass on the mental condition of these patients in the different hospitals, so that the Attorney General may transfer those that are found mentally defective or insane to this authorized hospital for treatment, and the following language may be quoted:

The Attorney General upon receiving such report of the medical board may direct a warden or superintendent, or other official having custody of the prisoner, to cause such prisoner to be removed to the United States hospital for defective delinquents, or to any other such institution as is now authorized by law to receive insane persons charged with or convicted of offenses against the United States, there to be kept until in the judgment of the superintendent of such hospital the prisoner shall be restored to sanity or health, or until the maximum sentence without deduction for good time or commutation of sentence shall have been served.

Then, there is provision that the proper State authority must be notified at the expiration of the sentence if the prisoner is insane, so that the State may provide for him to prevent him from becoming a menace to the public.

When Mr. Bates was before the committee in support of the bill, on page 29 of the hearings, he made this statement:

That is a very real question in the discipline of prisoners, and so we have presented that bill asking for the construction of a general hospital for the insane and the feeble-minded.

That was the reason given for building the hospital. This hospital now under construction will care for 200 more than the Judiciary Committee understood it was providing for at the time it made the authorization. Congress was spending money rather freely about that time. It made an appropriation of $1,250,000 to start the construction, and since there were some tubercular patients in Atlanta, Ga., then being kept out in the yard in tents, Mr. Bates very properly called the attention of the Committee on Appropriations to the fact that they would be moved from Atlanta to this hospital when completed. I know he was perfectly sincere, and no one questions the honesty or sincerity of Mr. Bates as to any statement he may have made about the hospital. He no doubt concluded it would be better to construct a separate building for the tubercular patients, and undertook to draw plans for a separate building, first locating it on one side and later on the other side, yet some distance removed from the hospital that had been authorized and is now under contract.

This hospital, as originally authorized and for which plans have been drawn and the contract for construction let, can care for all Federal tubercular patients if it is desired to transfer them there. The question might have arisen as to the original act if it had appeared that it was to provide for tubercular prisoners whether the site selected was the best. I have no doubt it is a beautiful location, but we all know that where one is suffering from tubercular trouble they usually prefer going to a high, dry climate, such as is found in Arizona, Texas, or Colorado; even the rich go there. The Government has built hospitals to care for Army and Navy tubercular patients in those sections. The question might properly arise, if it becomes necessary to provide a separate hospital for tubercular prisoners, whether they might not best be located at a place in high, dry sections.

I am calling attention to the fact that this authorization act and the hearings had thereon show that this hospital was built to care for the insane, and that the number they provided for was in excess of the insane they were required to care for at that time. They said 550 would probably be the bed capacity. That was 200 more than the number of insane prisoners. This hospital, for which a contract has been let, will care for about 750. It is ample for present needs as to insane and tubercular.

Permit me to warn you against building too many Federal hospitals to care for the blind, the infirm, the insane, the tubercular. Why? Because when you do, it will be found that in many States, if not all, when it becomes known that the Federal Government is provided with excellent facilities for caring for these unfortunates, a way will be found to send the blind, the feeble, the lame, the insane, and so forth, to Federal hospitals, where they will be kept free from expense to the State, to the county, or the city.

We can easily go too far and—just as the Attorney General has tried to limit Federal offenses, where the acts are also offenses against State laws, so as to require the States to carry out their duties in providing punishment for such crimes, and not place this heavy load upon the Federal Government—so I warn you not to build expensive hospitals to care for State offenders.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. My distinguished friend from Missouri, a prominent member of the Committee on the Judiciary, in a very recent speech, speaking of the act which he sponsored, and which has brought many old and many young violators into Federal prisons, said:

If the States are to surrender their right to try these cases and to look alone to the Federal Government to punish and care for them at great expense, I would favor the repeal of that statute.

The gentleman was right. Carrying out just what I have tried to say to you, be cautious when you undertake to provide these hospitals to care for the afflicted who commit crimes against State laws, recently made crimes also by Federal laws. The States, the counties, and the cities are primarily charged with that duty.

It will be found that we have provided a very liberal probation system, where judges will be more lenient, I hope, in the cases of those afflicted with mental troubles, with lung troubles, with blindness, and other like ills, and we may be relieved of this load by leaving to States the care and punishment of such cases.

May I call your attention to one very interesting case? An insane man in a Federal prison, his mind slightly defective, I am informed, when he came there, becoming perhaps a little more acute—when his sentence expired, the Federal Government, at its expense, sent him back to his home, the home from which he came, to those who should care for him. What happened? The United States marshal was arrested because the State had passed a law against bringing into the State anyone who was insane. That case is still pending, so I am informed. It all shows that we must be careful in loading up the Federal Government with State, county, and city offenders where they commit offenses against State laws. That is why I wanted to call attention to this matter.

This is a beautiful hospital, wonderful location, no doubt; much larger than my friend from Missouri, when he voted out this bill, contemplated it would be. We are carrying every dollar necessary to complete one hospital, as authorized by law and now contracted for.

Mr. JOHNSON of Missouri. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Missouri. Did I understand the gentleman to say that the hospital would have facilities to care for the tubercular prisoners?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Facilities far better than in almost any State; far better than in the gentleman's State.

Mr. JOHNSON of Missouri. Would the gentleman contend it would be proper to house tubercular patients with patients who were not tubercular, or should they not be isolated?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. When this hospital was originally designed it was designed in sections. There are large open rooms, rooms smaller, rooms for acute and semiacute cases, rooms for the infirm. Tubercular patients would come under that designation. There are no insane patients for these units. The hospital has capacity greater than is required for the number of tubercular and insane prisoners we now have.

Mr. JOHNSON of Missouri. Will the gentleman yield for another question?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Yes; I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Missouri. Director Bates, of the Bureau of Prisons, did testify, did he not, that it was necessary to have enlarged space there for the tubercular prisoners?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I think Mr. Bates unquestionably feels we should have that.

Mr. JOHNSON of Missouri. It is a fact, is it not, that the Federal Government, through Director Bates, represented to the various communities that this hospital would care for the tubercular prisoners, and upon those representations the people of Springfield, Mo., donated $133,500 for the site?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I have tried many cases; you have heard many cases tried in court, and you have oftentimes heard of the rivalry between different localities for Government buildings. It so happens that in this case the record discloses that many States were bidding for this hospital, offering free sites. I wonder if when the wide-awake city of Springfield read the hearings and found that Indiana and other States were offering free sites if that was not a large factor prompting Springfield's offer of a free site. And what happened? The request was made by the department, when Congress came to make the appropriation, "Give us authority to accept a free site." Why? Because there are many free sites offered, not alone in Missouri but in other States.

Yet we now find this splendid community of Springfield complaining because, forsooth, we do not propose to spend quite as much as they understood the Government would. Two million and twenty-five thousand is appropriated. They demand $2,500,000. They say they donated a site costing $135,000, but overlook the fact that they will have a most wonderful building thereon, costing over $2,000,000, a building capable of housing many kinds of afflicted prisoners. We find the people of that community saying, "We do not want the Federal Government to save any money in building this institution to care for the infirm, the blind, the tubercular, and the insane." They insist, "You must spend more money and build a costly separate tubercular hospital," although the act authorized only one hospital. There is no mention made of tubercular prisoners in the original act. Why then do they protest? Because, forsooth, Mr. Bates in his enthusiasm said that this institution would cost $2,500,000.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. JOHNSON of Missouri. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Missouri. Regardless of any mental influence that might have been exerted upon the people of Springfield which induced them to donate this site, yet if the Government, through Mr. Bates, represented and promised that it would expend $2,500,000 for the erection of buildings which would house defective delinquents, including those needing psychopathic treatment as well as treatment for tuberculosis, can anything justify the Government of the United States in now going back on its pledge and on its promise?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. The gentleman is a lawyer, and he knows that every Federal official is nothing but an agent with limited authority. The people in this community were supposed to know what the law was under which Mr. Bates was acting. As I have said, no Federal official has the right to go out and bind this Congress for the expenditure of money in large amounts simply because he may sincerely believe he has authority to do so.

Mr. LOZIER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Yes.

Mr. LOZIER. The gentleman has stated the legal aspect of the case very clearly, but does the gentleman think it is ethical for the United States Government to hold out to the public that they intend to build a $2,500,000 hospital, and solicit sites from cities, giving the people of those communities a bill of particulars, leading them to believe that it will be a $2,500,000 project, thereby stimulating them to more liberal donations, and then abandon a very considerable part of the proposed program—does the gentleman think that is ethical? Although no representative of the Government has the right to bind the Government, does the gentleman think it is ethical and morally right for the Government to stimulate people to make a donation of that kind on the belief that they are going to get a $2,500,000 proposition, and then when they have made that contribution the Government says, "We will cut it down to $2,000,000 or $1,500,000 without refunding in whole or in part the contribution made by a city that relied on the representations of the Government officials that they would get a $2,500,000 project—does the gentleman think that is ethical?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. That is a fair question, and I am very glad to answer it. Sometimes it is well to answer a question by asking a question. Is it the gentleman's opinion that it would be the ethical thing for Congress, representing 120,000,000 people, with a deficit of $2,000,000,000 now facing us, simply because the agent of the Government, with limited authority, and who, of course, had to follow the express will of Congress—everybody dealing with the agent being charged with the legal limitations on his authority—yet because in his enthusiasm the agent may have said that the buildings would cost $2,500,000—can it be that Springfield, in the spirit of a Shylock, can say to Congress it is unethical not to spend $2,500,000 on the hospital, although Congress finds that the hospital now contracted for will adequately provide for its prison needs and is in strict accord with the act of authorization?

Mr. LOZIER. Now I shall be pleased to answer the question propounded by my friend the gentleman from Alabama, whom I always delight to follow because of his uniform fairness and great ability. Of course, if the Government does not need a $2,500,000 hospital at Springfield, it should not build one to cost that sum. But if it is needed to properly care for the tubercular patients, it should be constructed. If the Government, having made these representations and having stimulated an excessive liberality on the part of the people of Springfield, finds on further investigation that in the interest of economy and public service it is not necessary to expend $2,500,000 on this project, does not equity and good conscience require the Government to do what an individual would do in dealing with another individual, namely, go to the people of Springfield and say, "We have changed our mind about this matter; we find a $2,000,000 structure will serve all our needs, and as we are not giving you as much as you were led to believe you would get, we are now willing to refund to the people of Springfield all or a part of the fund which they were induced to donate on the representation that the Government was going to locate a $2,500,000 institution in the community"?

Does the gentleman think that after having obtained this donation on such representations, if the Government changes its plans, as it has the right to do, that in equity and good conscience it can retain the donations, there having been a failure or a partial failure of consideration?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I would answer the gentleman by saying that Missouri is ably represented on the floor of the House. There are many splendid lawyers in its delegation, and if these gentlemen feel that an injustice has been done Springfield because of the facts detailed by the gentleman, why not file a bill asking for the refund of $135,000 and let Congress pass on it. That course is fair and open to the gentleman. If Congress should conclude that the gentleman's contention is sound, the Government will save money by refunding the $135,000 rather than approve the amendment which the gentleman from Missouri now offers carrying $500,000 additional.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will my colleague yield for a question?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. In this implied guaranty or warranty that is held here as having been made by Mr. Bates, was any time limit fixed within which the Congress should appropriate two and a half million dollars?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. No.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Is it therefore a breach of faith if we do not in this immediate bill appropriate the full amount?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I was going to call attention to the fact that we are cutting quite a good many appropriations. We cut one over at Chillicothe a few moments ago. We cut one last Saturday $1,100,000 in Oklahoma. We did not have this kind of plea then. It was said that building would cost two and a half million dollars, and we are providing less than $1,200,000 for it. You will find all through this bill we have cut appropriations; and if you do not approve these cuts, how do you propose to meet the deficit? Can it be possible that when we can save money and provide facilities for our needs that then we are to listen to the plea of some locality that we must increase the amount because they feel we owe it to them because some official said a certain building should cost so much?

I want to now read you something that is of real interest.

Mr. MAY. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Yes.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for five additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

Mr. MAY. The gentleman appears to be a very excellent lawyer and has stated here that the gentleman who made these representations was an unauthorized agent of the Government.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Well, every agent of the Government is unauthorized if he acts beyond the authority set out in the organic act, which in this case authorized one hospital, not two. There was no authority for a separate tubercular hospital.

Mr. MAY. I would like to ask the gentleman to explain to the committee if it is not an equitable principle, recognized throughout the law of this land, that the acceptance of a donation and the retention of it constitutes a ratification of the agency, if it was without authority, and if they keep the $130,000, that is a ratification.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. If the gentleman is correct, and he feels he can impress the House with that fact, the Government should refund the $135,000, your remedy is adequate.

I now want to speak to you about another matter.

Mr. DYER. Before the gentleman does that will he yield to me?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Yes.

Mr. DYER. With respect to the statement that the Government or the representatives of the Government or of the Department of Justice did not have authority to proceed upon the theory they would get the full amount, I will ask the gentleman if it is not a fact that the second deficiency bill of last year authorized $2,500,000 for this institution?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. There was appropriated $1,250,000——

Mr. DYER. Is not that the fact?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. The Committee on Appropriations can not legislate. That was only an authorization, and no contract has been let thereunder for more than $1,710,000. So the contractor can not complain. There has been no contract let beyond $1,710,000, and we are carrying in this bill $775,000 in order to pay the balance due on the contract and to provide for necessary utility construction in connection with this institution.

Mr. DYER. Is the gentleman acquainted with that provision in the second deficiency appropriation act which authorized $2,500,000?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. It dies with the year, the gentleman understands.

Mr. DYER. But there was authority in that bill for it.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. If so, the authority was not exercised.

Mr. JOHNSON of Missouri. Will the gentleman now yield to me on a matter to which he has referred?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Missouri. The gentleman said that if the citizens of Springfield were dissatisfied or felt they had been defrauded, they could present a bill to the Congress. I want to state to the gentleman that the citizens of Springfield are not pleading for charity. They do not want to be placed in the position of asking reimbursement where they have been defrauded, if that is proper——

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I yielded to the gentleman for a question.

Mr. JOHNSON of Missouri. They simply feel that they have been promised a building costing two and a half million dollars and that there is need for the building.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Gentlemen, I would not for a moment have taken up your time in referring to that part of the gentleman's argument if he had not confined his argument largely to that one fact, since to my mind, from a legal standpoint, it is untenable.

They say, because of the promise of Mr. Bates to give them two and a half million dollars, nothing else will satisfy. Then I say, if they are right, let them introduce a bill for a refund. Why spend $500,000 when we can discharge the obligation with $135,000?

Now, gentlemen, here is what I wish to call attention to. The committee found there had been very expensive estimates submitted for medical care at existing institutions. We found that at Atlanta, at Leavenworth, McNeil Island, Chillicothe, and Alderson, five prisons in all, that for many years preceding the recent legislation authorizing the Public Health Service to take over the medical service that we had been appropriating far less than was estimated by the Public Health Service. We spent for that purpose $84,980 at all of the institutions named. What do you suppose the Public Health Service requested for those same institutions? Two hundred and sixty-nine thousand dollars for personal services, which before had cost about $84,000. The committee said, "This was too much." Yet the committee was reasonable and only cut it to $200,000.

Take the hospital at Springfield. What do you suppose they estimate you should appropriate for medical services there after it is completed? The modest sum of $134,000; this to care for a hospital population of not exceeding 800 prisoners, whereas we have been caring for 11,000 prison population in six widely separated institutions for $84,000; that is to say, for medical personnel services. Here is the set-up for the Springfield hospital as it appears in the hearings on pages 434 and 435:

A supplemental list of medical personnel to be required for the Springfield institution includes the following:

Number	Position	1933
	Medical and dental personnel:
1	Superintendent (medical officer in charge)	$7,200
1	Assistant superintendent	6,028
3	Resident physician	9,474
1	Dental officer (assistant surgeon)	4,039
	Nursing personnel:
1	Chief nurse	2,600
1	Assistant chief nurse	2,300
11	Head nurse (4 female, 7 male), at $2,100	23,100
18	Nurse (10 female, 8 male), at $1,920	34,560
	Visiting consultants:
1	Consultant in surgery	2,000
1	Consultant in eye, ear, nose, and throat	1,200
1	Consultant in internal medicine	600
1	Consultant in Röntgenology	600
1	Consultant in urology	600
	Other technical personnel:
1	Pathologist	4,039
1	Chief occupational therapy aide	2,600
1	Chief physiotherapy aide	2,600
1	Head occupational therapy aide	2,000
1	Head physiotherapy aide	2,000
2	Physiotherapy aide, at $1,920	3,840
6	Occupational therapy aide, at $1,920	11,520
1	Oral hygienist	1,800
1	Druggist	1,620
2	Laboratory technician (1 X-ray and 1 clinical laboratory)	3,240
2	Medical interne	3,120
1	Dental interne	1,560
62	Net total personnel services	134,240

If Congress did not come in and sometimes save the Public Treasury from the demands of public officials in executive departments, instead of a deficit of $2,000,000,000 you would have a deficit of $3,000,000,000. [Applause.]

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I am not finding fault with the chairman of the committee in charge of this bill, the gentleman from Alaboma [Mr. OLIVER], for whom I have the greatest regard. I know that he is a most efficient public servant and is trying to do the thing that ought to be done, but I do dislike to have the gentleman from Alabama leave the thought with the Members that the State of Missouri or the people of Springfield, Mo., are trying to get something to which they are not entitled. I do not want this hospital, personally, enlarged as outlined in previous appropriation bills unless it is necessary for the benefit of those whom it is to serve, but the gentleman will recall that last year in the second deficiency appropriation bill we did provide for this institution at a limit of cost of two and a half million dollars. If we do not need the tubercular end of it, very well, but in the hearings on that bill there was testimony to the effect that it was to be used in part for the care of tubercular patients. That is true. I am not complaining or fussing with the gentleman from Alabama. I want him to conserve the resources of the country; and, if we do not need the money, all right. But I do not like the impression to go forth that I am, or anyone from Missouri is, and of course I speak only for myself, trying to get through an appropriation larger than the project deserves. I do not care so much about what the Springfield people get, that is a secondary matter. It is only as to what is needed for the people that this institution is intended to serve. If the facts are different now from what they were, and we do not need it, then I do not want to support it; but I do not want the impression to go out that the Department of Justice, acting in pursuance of legislation which Congress enacted and in pursuance of the act of appropriation that it passed authorizing two and a half million dollars, or its officials, or any one of them, have done anything but that which they had a right to do and should do; and I know that the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OLIVER], who is in close touch with the Department of Justice in these matters and with the superintendent of prisons, agrees with me that what I am saying is correct.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I think that Mr. Bates is an excellent official and that he would not intentionally make any misstatement. He was encouraged, no doubt, to make the statement by what the gentleman has said. As a separate institution it was never discussed at all, because there are rooms and dormitories in this hospital being built where you can well care for tubercular patients, and much better than our States now care for these unfortunate sufferers.

Mr. DYER. I have no doubt of the correctness of the statement of the gentleman from Alabama, but there was testimony in the hearings to which I have made reference that it was to be used in part for tubercular patients.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Not before the gentleman's committee.

Mr. DYER. In the Committee on Appropriations itself, in the second deficiency appropriation bill. If we do not need this money, all right; but let us say so in a fair and square manner without reflecting on any official or any department of the Government that has proceeded under the authority of Congress in two instances, one the act itself and one the appropriation bill to which I have made reference.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. If this building, as Mr. Bates states, is necessary, does not the gentleman think, in view of the fact that there has been talk from the beginning of this Congress that there should be a great building program put out for the unemployed, that it would be worth while continuing it for that reason?

Mr. DYER. I would rather take the judgment of the gentleman from Alabama on a matter of that kind than of anyone else, but I want him to be fair.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DYER. Yes.

Mr. HOPKINS. Provided it can take care of tubercular patients in this smaller unit, they will be taken care of in lieu of other patients who should be brought there, will they not?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I think they have ample bed room for all patients that should be sent there.

Mr. HOPKINS. If tubercular patients are sent there, they will be sent there in place of people who are partially insane or invalid paralytics.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate upon this section and all amendments thereto be closed in 10 minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I rise in favor of the amendment.

I regret that I must differ with the committee in this matter. I do so not because this institution happens to be located in my State but for reasons of economy, the very reasons that have been urged in opposition.

There is no question about the authorization. Let me read it to you. The authorization provides for patients—

> Afflicted with an incurable or chronic degenerative disease or so defective * * * physically as to require special medical care and treatment not available in an existing Federal institution.

Under this authorization the department planned an institution with facilities for the treatment of all such diseases, and, of course, they included quarters for the isolation and treatment of tuberculosis. No modern prison would be complete, no modern penal institution would comply with even the elementary requirements, which did not afford accommodations for the treatment of this dread scourge. The department, after consulting the most eminent medical authorities available, drafted plans providing for wards in which victims of the white plague could be humanely nursed back to health and usefulness. They went before the Bureau of the Budget with a request for an appropriation of $2,500,000 to carry out these plans. The Budget officials, after examining the proposition exhaustively, cut this estimate to $1,250,000. That was considered to be a minimum. But the subcommittee, taking into consideration the reduction in the cost of materials and labor since the plans were first drawn, reduced the amount to $1,050,000. That is the amount which it was intended this bill should carry.

And now we come to the real issue in the matter. In this debate we have not yet touched on the real consideration which brings this question before you. Up to the time the bill was taken up in the committee en banc no one had thought of omitting the tuberculosis wards. It had not been suggested either in the hearings before the Budget Bureau or the subcommittee of the House. And the appropriation of $1,250,000 was considered to be the irreducible minimum.

Why, then, this sudden proposal to reduce the estimate a further $225,000? It was not made for purposes of economy. It was not made in order to retrench expenditures. It was not made to balance the Budget. It was made because there were some who raised the question of location—some who believed that the site selected was the wrong place for a tubercular hospital. They insisted that it ought to be located in New Mexico or Arizona or some neighboring State where the climate was supposed to be better adapted to the treatment of pulmonary troubles. And they wanted to defer the erection of the plant until they could take up the question of location and go into the merits of the claim that ultra-dry climates are better adapted to the treatment of respiratory maladies.

Such position is not supported by modern scientific knowledge. That theory, once so generally accepted, has now been abandoned. And happily so. Specialists in the treatment of tuberculosis are now agreed that climate is not an essential consideration. The Government itself issued a bulletin emphasizing that fact just last month. If you will call up the department and ask for their publication under the title of "Tuberculosis," you will receive the Government's treatise on the subject, in which the emphatic statement is made that it is no longer considered necessary to leave home and go to some distant State to be cured. With proper care and nourishment this disease may be cured to-day in any State in the Union.

And, so far as climate is concerned, there is no more healthful place in the world than up here at Springfield in the foothills of the Ozarks. This section has become in recent years the playground and health resort of the Middle West. If any of you wish "to be shown," I invite you to come to Missouri this summer and drive along our modern highways and enjoy the beauty and salubrious climate of this far-famed "Land of a Thousand Smiles." You will then understand the selection of this site for this great institution. The department had bids from half a dozen different States. They considered more than a score of possible locations, and they did not decide the question solely on the basis of the contribution made by Springfield. They had offers of sites from many cities. They selected Springfield because they were convinced after long study and investigation that it offered the most healthful location that could be found for the purpose.

And now we come to the question of economy. Some may have the impression that a reduction of this item means economy—that it will save the Government money. Nothing could be further from the facts. This hospital must be built somewhere; if not at Springfield, then somewhere else. And it is vastly cheaper to build it here. This vast plant which is to be constructed at Springfield at an expense of more than a million dollars is equipped with a central heating plant, a general laundry, a common dairy, storehouses, administration buildings, farm and garden with all needed farm buildings. If the hospital is built here, all these items will be saved. If erected elsewhere these will all have to be supplied at heavy cost. At Springfield there will be no such construction costs to be charged exclusively to the hospital, and the additional cost of maintenance will be infinitesimal. To build the hospital here as originally planned will result in a very material saving to the Government both in original capital outlay and in maintenance for all the years to come.

And there was still another reason for the location at Springfield. This site was selected after full consideration because it is conveniently located, geographically, in the approximate center of the area which is supposed to be served. If it is taken over toward the Pacific coast and located on the outer rim of this area, the Government will be put to that much additional expense every time it is necessary to reach it or leave it.

In brief, for every reason which can be advanced—for reasons of geographical location, for reasons of health and climate, for reasons of economy, both in construction and maintenance—this hospital should be provided for as originally planned and intended and the amendment should be approved.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON. I yield.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. If the question was before Congress now as to whether they would build a separate hospital to care for tubercular cases, in view of the facts now known, this Congress would not, in my judgment, vote any amount. I will say to the gentleman that I have no desire to change the site unless later it becomes necessary to build a hospital for tubercular patients, and then Congress should consider the best place for such a hospital. That was not in my mind, nor did the full committee discuss it at all, but they struck this out and fixed the amount of the appropriation, because it was thought that would amply provide for the Government's present needs.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. All time has expired on this paragraph.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. JOHNSON].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. JOHNSON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I have sent to the desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. JOHNSON] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. JOHNSON of Missouri: In line 5, on page 52, strike out the words "completion of" and insert in lieu thereof "continuation of the work upon."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to return to page 114, the item providing for commissioners of conciliation. I want to offer an amendment to that paragraph and also to the paragraph appearing on page 116, in reference to the Bureau of Labor Statistics. I do not care to retard the committee, but I would like to offer these amendments.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I shall have to object. I object.

The Clerk read as follows:

Investigating mine accidents: For investigations as to the causes of mine explosions, causes of falls of roof and coal, methods of mining, especially in relation to the safety of miners, the appliances best adapted to prevent accidents, the possible improvement of conditions under which mining operations are carried on, the use of explosives and electricity, the prevention of accidents, statistical studies and reports relating to mine accidents, and other inquiries and technologic investigations pertinent to the mining industry, including all equipment, supplies, and expenses of travel and subsistence, purchase not exceeding $2,400, exchange as part payment for, operation, maintenance, and repair of motor-propelled passenger-carrying vehicles for official use in field work, purchase of laboratory gloves, goggles, rubber boots, and aprons, $440,325, of which amount not to exceed $77,310 may be expended for personal services in the District of Columbia.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, in my absence from the Chamber temporarily I have requested the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. DOUGLAS], a member of the committee, to offer some committee amendments.

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. Mr. Chairman, I offer a committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arizona offers a committee amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment offered by Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona: On page 102, in line 15, strike out the amount "$440,325" and insert in lieu thereof "$435,325."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Testing fuel: To conduct inquiries and scientific and technologic investigations concerning the mining, preparation, treatment, and use of mineral fuels, and for investigation of mineral fuels belonging to or for the use of the United States, with a view to their most efficient utilization; to recommend to various departments such changes in selection and use of fuel as may result in greater economy, and, upon request of the Director of the Bureau of the Budget, to investigate the fuel-burning equipment in use by or proposed for any of the departments, establishments, or institutions of the United States in the District of Columbia, $170,000, of which amount not to exceed $30,700 may be expended for personal services in the District of Columbia.

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. Mr. Chairman, I offer a committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arizona offers a committee amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Committee amendment offered by Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona: On page 104, at the beginning of line 15, strike out the figures "$170,000" and insert in lieu thereof the figures "$136,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mineral-mining investigations: For inquiries and scientific and technologic investigations concerning the mining, preparation, treatment, and utilization of ores and mineral substances, other than fuels, with a view to improving health conditions and increasing safety, efficiency, economic development, and conserving resources through the prevention of waste in the mining, quarrying, metallurgical, and other mineral industries; to inquire into the economic conditions affecting these industries; and including all equipment, supplies, expenses of travel and subsistence, and the purchase, not to exceed $2,500, including exchange, operation, maintenance, and repair of motor-propelled passenger-carrying vehicles for official use in field work, including not to exceed $17,000 for personal services in the District of Columbia, $157,185: Provided, That no part of this appropriation may be expended for an investigation in behalf of any private party.

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. Mr. Chairman, I offer a committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arizona offers a committee amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Committee amendment offered by Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona: On page 105, in line 7, strike out the amount "$157,185" and insert in lieu thereof the amount "$125,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of inquiring of the gentleman from Alabama whether he has furnished to Members of the House a table showing the prices of automobiles, as was suggested in the debate on Saturday and, if not, when he proposes to do so?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I did not understand that I was to furnish such a table. I understood the gentleman was to prepare some amendments and submit them to me for consideration. That amendment will come up to-morrow and not this afternoon.

Mr. GOSS. Has the gentleman any definite information as to the prices of these cars in the various sections of the country?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. As far as I know, there is no reason why we should change the amount as set out in the amendment. I think the gentleman will find that cars of that class will be much cheaper a month from now than they are to-day.

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I dislike to take issue with my distinguished colleague from Alabama. In these days of unemployment I do not see any reason why a request to return to certain items should be objected to when other Members have been permitted to go back to items and consider them. I asked unanimous consent to return to the item in reference to the commissioners of conciliation as well as to the item with reference to the Bureau of Labor Statistics, but the gentleman from Alabama objected.

These activities are vital to-day, because they are engaged in the work of finding jobs for people and furnishing statistics which are of vital importance. I do not understand how the chairman of this subcommittee could object to such a proposition.

I have never objected when any Member asked unanimous consent to return to items in a bill which had been passed over, items which might have had relation to mining, to the farmers, or anything else. I believe every part of the United States should have its say, at least, have an opportunity to offer amendments.

The understanding I had was that after the conclusion of the Washington exercises we would begin the reading of this bill. That was the understanding I had, and I would like an opportunity to offer these amendments. I do not want to take any time in debate on them at all, but I would like the opportunity of offering the amendments; one being an amendment raising the amount for the commissioners of conciliation by $20,000, which would allow them to have these conciliators go into these disputes in labor.

The Secretary of Labor says he is in absolute need of this additional money. The other amendment has reference to the Bureau of Labor Statistics, and it provides for increasing the amount by $47,000, so that that bureau may continue the work of collecting data throughout the United States which is vital to the Congress and to the people of the United States.

At this point, Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to return——

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. CONNERY. Yes; I yield.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Do I understand the gentleman is willing to submit his amendments without debate?

Mr. CONNERY. Yes; I shall offer my amendments without any debate at all.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Then, may I make this statement, and I shall not discuss the matter further than to say that the committee was unanimous, both the full committee and the subcommittee, in the belief that the amounts carried are sufficient.

With the understanding, then, there will be no debate on the amendments, but that the gentleman from Massachusetts may have the opportunity of offering the two amendments referred to, I ask unanimous consent that the committee return to the sections referred to by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

There was no objection.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment. On page 114, line 13, after the word "service," strike out "$205,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$225,000."

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CONNERY: Page 114, in line 13, strike out "$205,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$225,000."

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. CONNERY) there were—ayes 9, noes 65.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment. On page 116, in line 18, after the word "bureau," strike out "$533,337" and insert in lieu thereof "$580,048."

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. CONNERY: On page 116, in line 18, strike out "$533,337" and insert in lieu thereof "$580,048."

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. CONNERY) there were—ayes 9, noes 60.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Oil and gas investigations: For inquiries and investigations and dissemination of information concerning the mining, preparation, treatment, and utilization of petroleum and natural gas, including economic conditions affecting the industry, with a view to economic development and conserving resources through the prevention of waste; for the purchase of newspapers relating to the oil, gas, and allied industries: Provided, That section 192 of the Revised Statutes (U. S. C., title 5, sec. 102) shall not apply to such purchase of newspapers from this appropriation; and for every other expense incident thereto, including supplies, equipment, expenses of travel and subsistence, purchase, not to exceed $7,000, exchange as part payment for, maintenance, and operation of motor-propelled passenger-carrying vehicles for official use in field work, purchase of laboratory gloves, goggles, rubber boots and aprons, $221,215, of which amount not to exceed $24,940 may be expended for personal services in the District of Columbia.

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. Mr. Chairman, by direction of the Committee on Appropriations I offer the following amendment.

Committee amendment offered by Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona: On page 106, in line 1, strike out "$221,215" and insert in lieu thereof "$146,215."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking the committee what these reductions are. We are voting on all these reductions and know nothing about them. There is no explanation made of them, not even a simple explanation is made to the committee, and I think we should have some explanation. Is this general throughout the department?

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. With respect to the first amendments, having to do with investigating mine accidents, there was a reduction of $5,000. Five thousand dollars was for the purpose of sending an American representative to England to cooperate with England in the matter of safety and safety appliances in coal mines. It was considered by the committee that this item was not now necessary. It might be a very nice thing to do if we could afford to do it, but in view of the critical condition of the country it is one of those things which we could well afford to do without temporarily.

I will say to the gentleman that the item of investigating mine accidents is a very interesting one. Under it the Government operates a coal mine in which it conducts investigations with respect to the explosive power of gases and powdered coal dust disseminated through the air. It conducts certain mechanical investigations. It conducts investigations with respect to the falling of roofs in coal mines.

It is my opinion that at this time we can reduce that item, but inasmuch as the item, with the exception of $5,000, has to do with the safety of human lives, because of the limited period of time to investigate the item—approximately six hours—it was considered wise not to ask for a further reduction. I trust that answers the gentleman.

Now, as to the reduction of the testing fuel item from $170,000 to $136,000, I think it is proper for gentlemen of the House to know that that is somewhat of an arbitrary act, a cut back to the appropriation in 1923.

The purpose of the money appropriated under that item is to permit the testing of fuel by the United States not only for governmental purposes but for operations conducted by States and private enterprise.

It was the feeling of the committee, although it was a very nice thing to have—experiments conducted for certain purposes—it was an item we could very well do away with under the present conditions, so the committee agreed that it should be reduced to the 1923 level.

Moreover, let me say this: That whenever there is created an agency to conduct experiments it is inevitable that the number of experiments which that agency is called upon to perform increases, not necessarily because there is an actual necessity for the conduct of these investigations but simply because here is an agency that is created to perform them.

Mr. GOSS. I think the noble experiment of prohibition should be considered by the committee and have a cut made there, as that is in the same line for experimentation purposes.

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. My particular function is to deal with the Bureau of Mines.

Mr. GOSS. I trust the gentleman will bear that in mind when we come to the prohibition item.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment. Mr. Chairman, I want to state to our friend that just now every family in the United States, rich and poor, who are spending money are asking themselves this question: Is it necessary; can we do without this expenditure?

It behooves the Government of the United States, as well, to ask itself that question; and that was the question that the subcommittee that framed the bill under the splendid tutelage of the gentleman from Alabama and the gentleman from Pennsylvania continually asked itself.

Just now many States in this Union have reduced the pay of their school-teachers, underpaid anyway, and they are paid in some States by vouchers or warrants which they have to discount, and many of them are going to have only 4 or 5 months of school instead of 9 months.

Mr. GOSS. I agree with the gentleman that some of these items should be reduced, but I hope that when we come to the prohibition item it will have its share of reduction.

Mr. BLANTON. I am not going to get off on that controversial question, because we have two hours in which to discuss that question when it arises to-morrow.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. FOSS. I think the gentleman wants to be fair?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. FOSS. The school-teachers in Massachusetts are being paid with real money.

Mr. BLANTON. I am glad to know that; but, unfortunately, in some States they are not so well fixed as they are in the big manufacturing State of Massachusetts, which has received so much from the Federal Government in the thousand-million-dollar subsidy that is handed to them under the tariff act, and it is because of their lion's share of that thousand-million-dollar tariff subsidy they get in Massachusetts through the Smoot-Hawley Tariff Act that they are able to do that, and it is the only State that I know of in the United States that now pays its teachers full 100 per cent. Out in Washington, are they doing so well, may I ask my friend?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Oh, we are holding up the school-teachers in the State of Washington, although we need money. However, we do not want to see it from the Federal Treasury yet.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. CONNERY. I would like to ask the gentleman if he is going to do everything in his power to support the $700,000,000 bill which the Committee on Labor, of which a Massachusetts man is chairman, has reported, which will take care of not only the school-teachers of Texas and Minnesota and other States but of the poor people in the United States generally?

Mr. BLANTON. I have always been for the poor people. It is the poor people that I have in mind all the time. It is the poor people in my State that are now clamoring for something to do that I have in mind, and it is their private budgets that I want to help balance, and to do that it is necessary that the Members of Congress balance the Government Budget. That is what the committee is trying to do by decreasing these appropriations.

The Clerk read as follows:

Economics of mineral industries: For inquiries and investigations, and the dissemination of information concerning the economic problems of the mining, quarrying, metallurgical, and other mineral industries, with a view to assuring ample supplies and efficient distribution of the mineral products of the mines and quarries, including studies and reports relating to uses, reserves, production, distribution, stocks, consumption, prices, and marketing of mineral commodities and primary products thereof; preparation of the reports of the mineral resources of the United States, including special statistical inquiries; and including personal services in the District of Columbia and elsewhere; purchase of furniture and equipment; stationery and supplies; typewriting, adding, and computing machines, accessories, and repairs; newspapers; traveling expenses; purchase, not exceeding $1,200, operation, maintenance, and repair of motor-propelled passenger-carrying vehicles for official use in field work; and for all other necessary expenses not included in the foregoing, $273,430, of which amount not to exceed $221,000 may be expended for personal services in the District of Columbia.

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment offered by Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona: Page 112, line 5, strike out "$273,430" and insert in lieu thereof "$225,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I think we are entitled to some explanation of this.

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. I shall be glad to give an explanation of the reduction effected by the amendment. The item of $273,430 originally included in the bill, carried under the head "Economics of Mineral Industries," was for the purpose of collating and tabulating all of the statistics with reference to the production and uses, and so forth, of minerals produced in the United States. It was considered by the subcommittee that inasmuch as all of the mineral industries are now in a very depressed condition and the production of almost every one of the minerals has fallen off substantially, and because the American Bureau of Metal Statistics is collating and tabulating and printing exactly the same information, it was justifiable to set the appropriation back to the level of 1928, when the mineral industry was not in the depressed condition in which it is now.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. Yes.

Mr. TILSON. If I heard the amendment correctly, it means that the proposed reduction of almost $50,000 is all cut out of the field service and that still $221,000, or practically the entire appropriation, may be expended in the District of Columbia. Is this the intention of the gentleman?

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. That was the intention.

Mr. TILSON. So that it will practically all be spent in the District of Columbia?

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. No. If the gentleman will read the language carefully he will find that it permits the $221,000, but does not make mandatory the expenditure of $221,000.

Mr. TILSON. Is it not intended to spend as much of it as possible in the District of Columbia, and thereby neglecting the field service?

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. It is entirely up to the Director of the Bureau of Mines to distribute these amounts as he may see fit. Most of the collating work and tabulating work is conducted within the District.

Mr. TILSON. But as the bill now stands, there must be at least $50,000 that can not be expended within the District.

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. The gentleman is quite right.

Mr. TILSON. This provision has been practically stricken from the appropriation, has it not?

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. Yes. But if the gentleman will take notice, the $221,000 need not, under the language of the bill, be expended. The language reads that "not more than that amount can be expended." Inasmuch as a cut of some $50,000 had been made, it was considered wise not to limit the director as to where that amount of money might be most effectively expended, in order that the purpose may be attained.

Mr. KVALE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. I yield.

Mr. KVALE. The gentleman, in the subcommittee, has probably broken down this item so that the gentleman from Alabama will be able to tell us how many people will lose employment as a result of this cut.

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. I will have to state frankly to the gentleman that I do not know how many will lose employment.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The Clerk read as follows:

Total, Bureau of Mines, $2,052,950.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I would like to ask the chairman of the subcommittee if this is in the nature of new legislation on the bill?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. No. That is not new legislation.

Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. McREYNOLDS, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 9349) making appropriations for the Departments of State and Justice and for the judiciary, and for the Departments of Commerce and Labor for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. SUMMERS of Washington (at the request of Mr. HADLEY), for one week, on account of death in family.

PENSIONS TO WIDOWS, MINOR CHILDREN, AND DEPENDENTS OF WORLD WAR VETERANS

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, although 13 years have elapsed since the termination of the World War, the Congress has failed to pass a bill granting pensions to the widows and orphans and certain other dependents of men who served their country during that trying period. The payment of pensions to widows and orphans of deceased veterans of the various wars that we have been engaged in—with the exception of the World War—is a fixed policy of our Government. It is not only a proper but a commendable policy. However, if it is proper for this policy to apply to other conflicts that we have waged, it is equally proper that it should be applied to those who served during the recent war. It is about time that the Federal Government should grant to widows and minor children and dependents of deceased veterans of the World War the same considerations that are extended to the survivors of deceased veterans of other wars.

At the present time death compensation is payable to the widow and minor children of deceased veterans of the World War whose death was either caused by service or hastened by something that occurred while in the service. In other words, death must be what is termed "service connected," before death compensation, as distinguished from a pension, will be paid to a surviving widow, children, or dependent parents. To connect up the death of a veteran with service is difficult, and at this late date is practically impossible. This situation presents a serious and troublesome problem, difficult to explain, and impossible to do so satisfactorily. It is an inequity which should be corrected this session. It is an unfortunate fact that practically all of the veterans who have died have left no estate to which their dependents can look for subsistence. This is particularly so with reference to those veterans of the World War who have taken the journey into "the great beyond." The condition that they found themselves in after the termination of the World War, physically or economically, was such that they were unable to earn sufficient to enable them to leave anything after them when they died. In most cases where they left a widow and children their dependents have had to look to the local government, city or town, for some assistance. In Massachusetts, for example, our local governments are compelled, as they should be, by law to provide something for their relief. The State contributes a certain portion thereof. There is absolutely no reason why this duty should not devolve upon the Federal Government. There is no reason why the taxpayers of State, city, and town should directly bear this burden. The duty rightfully rests with the Federal Government. The passage of such legislation would repose this duty where it belongs and remove from the shoulders of the taxpayers of the State governments and their subdivisions this burden and this cost. There is no justifiable reason why local government should be compelled to continue to carry this burden.

Such legislation should become law during this session of the Congress.

LINCOLN AND TO-DAY

Mr. MAJOR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks by including an address delivered by Governor Pinchot at Springfield, Ill., on February 11 on the occasion of the one hundred and twenty-third anniversary of the birth of Abraham Lincoln.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. MAJOR. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following:

"NOT TO FIRST BASE"

How many of our national leaders can declare with Lincoln, "I have never had a feeling politically that did not spring from the sentiments embodied in the Declaration of Independence"?

Can Mellon?

Can Hoover?

Suppose Abraham Lincoln were a candidate for President this year on his platform of human rights.

Where would he get with the controlling powers of the Republican convention in Chicago?

He wouldn't get to first base!

This Nation needs the spirit of Lincoln as it has not needed it since the Civil War. It needs his honest strength, his homely wisdom, his devotion to the plain people, and the sound and simple principles by which he lived and died. Never since he led it through the greatest crisis of its history has our country needed the Lincoln kind of leadership so desperately as now, when millions are in the deepest distress and tens of millions in great trouble.

But if we can not bring Lincoln back to life, nor turn to a living Lincoln for leadership again, we can still learn from his life, we can still follow the trails he blazed. We can still turn, in our hour of need, to the things he stood for, to the ideals he held high, to the undying principles he loved and left behind him.

From coast to coast the Nation to-day does honor to Lincoln's name. But it is an empty tribute, a useless gesture, if we lose sight of all he worked for and fought for and gave his life to.

Many an orator will praise Lincoln to-day who would have hated and opposed him had he been alive. When Theodore Roosevelt died, the men who had fought him most bitterly, the men who contested to the last ditch everything he stood for, at once began to sing their hymns of adulation. To them Roosevelt was no longer dangerous. His enormous power no longer drove toward equality of opportunity and the square deal. They praised him because he was no longer in their way.

Is it not so to-day with Lincoln?

These men are doubtless glad enough that Lincoln can not be here to see how far our National Government has fallen away from the example he set—how little our leaders follow the ideals of the man they pretend to honor.

Lincoln was essentially a man of the people. Not because he was born in a log cabin. Not because as a youth he split rails and worked with his hands. Rather because his thoughts were the thoughts of the people, his desires their desires, and his whole purpose and action were aimed to protect and further their welfare.

He hated slavery because he believed in popular liberty. He believed that no man, black or white, should ever bow in personal or economic submission to the will of any other man. In that spirit he held that the first duty of our Government is to guard the people against every group and every interest that might try to take their liberty from them.

From this same root sprang his deep concern for the Nation as a nation. America, to him, was the stronghold of the rights of the people against political or economic domination by any selfish power from without or within. "As a nation of free men," he once said, "we must live through all time, or die by suicide."

In the 70 years since Lincoln died, what has happened to this Nation of ours, to which he gave the last full measure of devotion? What would he think of it could he see it to-day? What would he think of a government given over to fostering a concentration of wealth unheard of before, and blind to the simple rights of common men?

As Lincoln understood liberty, this Nation is not free to-day. How can men be free and equal when multimillionaires grow fat and multiply while millions go hungry and cold? How can the Nation be free when the policies of its Government are dictated by a handful of the overrich? How can its people be free when its God-given wealth is taken from the many and so concentrated in few hands that the 1930 incomes of 504 men could have bought the entire wheat crop of this country and the entire cotton crop besides? How can its business be free when 200 out of 300,000 corporations control half of its corporate wealth?

How can the Nation be free when its leaders put business ahead of human welfare—when they rank money higher than men?

I heard Senator NORRIS say the other day that Mellon, with his millions of income each year, is the only United States Treasurer in our history who ever had three Presidents serve under him. Is Mellon, whose only power is money, the right kind of ruler for a free people? Has Mellon anything in common with Lincoln? Has the administration, out of which he has just been promoted? Has Hoover?

We have more to fight against to-day than depression. We have more to regain than prosperity. Our greatest task is to rid our people of the shackles of concentrated wealth and power—to make ourselves once more a nation of free men.

How many of our national leaders can declare with Lincoln, "I have never had a feeling, politically, that did not spring from the sentiments embodied in the Declaration of Independence"? Can Mellon? Can Hoover?

Suppose Abraham Lincoln were a candidate for President this year on his platform of human rights.

Where would he get with the controlling power of the Republican convention in Chicago?

He wouldn't get to first base.

How many politicians now in power have ever had a feeling, politically, that did not spring from the interests of rich contributors to campaign funds, from politics for profit, or from their belief that big business ought to run this country?

Lincoln well knew that the principles of the Declaration would be threatened in times to come. He knew how future prosperity might dull the edges of the Nation's political perception, and how eagerly that chance would be seized on by those who wanted only to use the people's government to further their own private gain. It was prophecy when he said:

"The assertion that 'all men are created equal' was of no practical use in effecting our separation from Great Britain; and it was placed in the Declaration, not for that, but for future use. Its authors meant it to be a stumbling block to all those who in after times might seek to turn a free people back into the hateful paths of despotism. They knew the proneness of prosperity to breed tyrants, and they meant, when such should reappear in this fair land and commence their vocation, that they should find left for them at least one hard nut to crack."

Prosperity-bred "tyrants"—the word is Lincoln's—are over us to-day. And they have brought upon the people the suffering that goes with tyranny, which is another name for government by autocrats, or plutocrats, or international bankers, or public utilities, or any other control without the consent of the governed.

Consider for a moment the depression and what is its main cause. Its main cause, all will agree, is that production has outstripped purchasing power. Why? Because too little of our national income goes to those who spend their income in buying—the farmer, the wage earner—and too much to those who, having more than they can spend, invest their income in more production.

So purchasing power falls behind producing power instead of balancing it, and the depression strikes us mainly because of the enormous, unhealthy, and unreasonable concentration of wealth in a few hands—a concentration which our Government has the power to stop, but which instead of stopping, it has promoted by every means in its power.

And now the same men whose greed brought the depression upon us have opposed and blocked every attempt to have the Nation help supply the necessities of life to those whom the concentration of wealth has stripped bare and stripped of their right to work as well.

Would Lincoln have refused to tax the wealthy to give food to the unemployed? Would he have allowed workingmen and their families to suffer through three winters without bringing the Government to their assistance? Would he have opposed a great national public-works program to give men jobs?

Above all, would Lincoln have given his first thought to big business in the face of human distress? Would he have turned his attention only to capital? Would he have mustered the Nation's resources only to the aid of railroads and banking?

Lincoln, who said, "Labor is the superior of capital and deserves much the higher consideration"—would he, while helping capital, have refused help to men, women, and children in want?

"We all declare for liberty," he once said, "but in using the same word we do not all mean the same thing. With some the word 'liberty' may mean for each man to do as he pleases with himself and the product of his labor; while, with others, the same word may mean for some men to do as they please with other men and the product of other men's labor."

Lincoln had a name for that sort of liberty which opposes government planning for industry, government security for workers, government limitations on the terms of work that employers may force from employees. That sort of liberty which permits "some men to do as they please with other men and the product of other men's labor" Lincoln called tyranny. It is still tyranny to-day.

Again, Lincoln spoke of "the two principles that have stood face to face from the beginning of time, and will ever continue to struggle. The one is the common right of humanity, and the other the divine right of kings. It is the same principle in whatever shape it develops itself. It is the same spirit that says, 'You toil and work and earn bread and I'll eat it.'"

No better definition could be given of the spirit of concentrated wealth that infests our Nation now. The ruthless exploiting of the wage earner and the farmer, the unequal division of profits that dried up purchasing power and was the main cause of the depression, taxation that releases the overrich at the expense of the average man, the system which allows stock-market gamblers to amass huge fortunes without doing a stroke of work, all these are shameful examples of the twentieth century version of what Lincoln meant by the divine right of kings.

"This country," Lincoln said, "with its institutions, belongs to the people who inhabit it." Certainly he would have used those institutions to save the country and its natural resources for the people to whom they belong and to keep this Nation free from the dictation of financial and industrial autocrats. To-day the United States is in the hands of big business and the great international bankers.

And that is precisely what Abraham Lincoln warned us against.

Lincoln said of the common people, "Let them beware of surrendering a political power which they already possess, and which, if surrendered will surely be used to close the door of advancement against such as they, and to fix new disabilities and burdens upon them, till all of liberty shall be lost." But liberty, though lost, can be regained. The people, through the power of the ballot, can still rise in their own defense. They can still cast off the chains of concentrated wealth and power that have deprived them of their liberty. And if they have the power they also have the right.

Listen to the Declaration of Independence: "We hold these truths to be self-evident, that all men are created equal; that they are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights; that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. That, to secure these rights, governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed; that, whenever any form of government becomes destructive of these ends, it is the right of the people to alter or abolish it."

It is not the form of our government that the people need to change; it is the substance. Under the ancient form a usurpation has grown up that is far more dangerous than any foreign invasion—a usurpation based on cunning, not on force, but all the harder to overcome on that account.

What our Government is being used for to-day is not the greatest good of the greatest number but the greatest wealth of the smallest number. The magnates who control it are seeking, through that control, the utmost concentration of wealth and power in the hands of the smallest possible number. Their gain is the people's loss. God knows they are succeeding in their evil purposes.

Let the people use the power that is theirs by every right, and return this Government to the rule of the people. Let them ask for nothing that was not demanded in the Declaration and established in the Constitution. Let them ask for nothing that is not American to the core. But let them free themselves and their children from the chains of special privilege and concentrated wealth. Let us have majority rule once more in the United States.

I call on the men and women who honor Lincoln for the living principles he embodied and not merely because he is dead. I call upon them to put in force once more the principles upon which this Nation was founded. I call upon them to use their strength, the strength the Constitution gives them, the strength that is in their votes once in four years. This Nation can never be free while its President is a servant of concentrated wealth.

Oh, I can hear the overrich exclaim in horror at what I say. I can see the lifted hands of those who have waxed fat. I can catch the denunciations launched against the man, any man, who dares to tell the truth about them and the Government they have acquired. But what about the rest of us?

What about the rest of us who believe in America as something more than a source of riches? What about the millions from whom the magnates have drained their substance? What about the millions who are hungry and cold? What about the plain people, whom Lincoln loved?

Is there any good reason why the people should not rule in America? They can if they choose.

They can if they will listen to Lincoln, who said:

"When the people rise in mass in behalf of the Union and the liberties of their country, truly may it be said, 'The gates of hell can not prevail against them.' * * * I wish you to remember, now and forever, that it is your business and not mine; that if * * * the liberties of these people shall be lost, it is but little to any one man but a great deal to the millions of people who inhabit these United States and to their posterity in all coming time. It is your business to rise up and preserve the Union and liberty for yourselves, and not for me."

GOVERNMENT WASTE

Mr. HART. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by including a radio address delivered by myself over the National Broadcasting facilities on January 31.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. HART. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following radio address sponsored by the Sentinels of the Republic, Washington, D. C., January 31, 1932:

It is my purpose this afternoon to call your attention to how rapidly and inexorably you are drifting away from government under the Constitution as exemplified by the writings of Jefferson, substituting therefor government by bureaus, which attempt by advice and direction to order the very life of the individual. I am going to quote here some figures to show you the rapid growth of the Government departments:

The appropriation for the Department of Agriculture in the year 1910 was $17,136,736. The number of employees was 12,480. The appropriation in 1932 is $247,000,000. The number of employees is 28,000.

I want to call your attention to one bureau in this Department of Agriculture, namely, the Extension Bureau. The bureau opened up for business in 1904 with an appropriation of $27,316.04. The appropriation for the coming year, which has just been passed by the House, for this extension service is $10,428,066. This does not include some overhead here in Washington in the Secretary's office.

This Extension Service since its inauguration has cost the Federal taxpayers $140,390,000. When matched by the States and counties this will cost the Nation over $280,000,000. Add to this the $500,000,000 appropriated for the Federal Farm Board and appropriations for other agencies in the Department of Agriculture and the total will run over a billion dollars. When you take into consideration the condition in which the farmer is now, can anyone believe this money has been wisely spent?

There are scores of bureaus here in Washington duplicating services furnished by the States, whose figures are just as appalling as the ones I have quoted to you, but time will not permit my discussion of them.

I will only have time to discuss one department of government and one independent bureau—the Department of Agriculture and the Federal Farm Board. They are so closely allied that you can not discuss one without the other. The Department of Agriculture, through its extension service, employs somewhere between six and seven thousand county agents, whose supposed business it is to teach the farmer how to produce more per man, per machine, per cow, per horse, per hen, and per acre.

On the other hand, we find the Farm Board, which is allied with this department and its activities, preaching the opposite doctrine, namely, to reduce farm crops to a domestic basis.

The alibi of the Department of Agriculture for this paternalistic work among the farmers is that they are endeavoring to lower the farmers' costs by increasing their production, and as the farmers' costs go down through increased production their prices go down in inverse ratio to the rise in his production.

The futility of further continuing these two agencies, one for increasing production and the other for decreasing production, both at a terrific expense to the taxpayer, should be patent to everyone.

The Department of Agriculture through its various bureaus is asking for about $20,000,000 for advice and direction to the farmer. Since when have these bureaus become more intelligent than the average farmer? Most of the members of these bureaus would starve if placed upon the farms of those they are now attempting to instruct.

These bureaus are supported by so-called farm leaders, who represent a small minority of the farmers. They use the same methods and psychology that were so successful in the patent-medicine business of an age just passed. You no doubt have seen pictures in magazines and newspapers of the patient bent over and his face showing signs of racking pain, with the statement below that after taking three bottles of the quack doctor's remedy he became a real man again.

These farm leaders point out the ills of the farmer and magnify them, and then, like the quack doctor, offer a quack remedy. These remedies have been disastrous to the farmer and expensive to the taxpayer. The greatest quack in the country to-day is the Farm Board. In the President's Budget for the coming year the Farm Board is asking for $1,880,000 for expenses for its officers. Let me give you a few of these salaries: 9 employees receive an average salary of $12,880 each per year; 8 employees receive $12,000 per annum each; 1, the general counsel, receives $20,000 per annum; 1 receives $8,500 per annum; and 78 employees receive salaries running from $4,000 to $6,500 per annum. The remainder of these salaries run from $3,350 down to as low as $1,200. The total for this personnel is $1,167,000. This is simply for the administrative work at Washington. In the light of results produced, I think we could well dispose of this entire fungus growth upon government.

Through cooperation with the Department of Agriculture they have more or less the direction of the six or seven thousand county agents scattered throughout the United States. With these huge appropriations maintaining this vast aggregation of field agents, they spread their tentacles into every section of the country. All these agents are schooled in propaganda; and unless the growth of this socialistic body is checked, they will destroy the sound business institutions of the country and, like the cancerous growth upon government which they are, they will eat out with their enormous salaries and inefficiencies the very vitals of agriculture and all business.

The Farm Board now is engaged principally in organizing cooperatives financed with Government money. Practically all handlers of farm produce to-day are losing money. The men managing the Farm Board are well aware of this and are feverishly organizing cooperatives and loaning them money with which to destroy independent business. This will leave the field clear for them to exploit the farmers. Will they do it? They are doing it now.

Witness the salaries paid to managers of cooperatives with the acquiescence of the Farm Board that furnishes the money. In addition to the salaries which I have mentioned earlier, we have Mr. Creekmore, head of the cotton cooperative, who has been receiving through salary and commissions $75,000 a year.

Mr. Milnor, head of the National Grain Corporation, a corporation organized by the Federal Farm Board, receives $50,000 per year. Could you not, my farmer friends, too, shed a few crocodile tears over our plight if in three short years you, like Mr. Milnor and Mr. Creekmore, could build a fortune of from $150,000 to $200,000. This money comes either from the United States Treasury or from the farmers. Ponder on these facts as measures of farm relief. Mr. Milnor not only heads the National Grain Corporation but also is the head of the Stabilization Corporation. He has issued a statement showing that the National Grain Corporation has made a very handsome profit. What is the connection between the National Grain Corporation, which Mr. Milnor heads, and the Stabilization Corporation, with its reservoir of Government funds, which Mr. Milnor also heads? How much interchange of business has taken place between these two institutions and how much money has been transferred from the Stabilization Corporation to the Farmers National Grain Corporation in the way of profits or commissions? Keep in mind that Mr. Milnor is the head of both institutions.

The Stabilization Corporation, obtaining its money from the Farm Board, is the banking institution which furnishes the money for the purchasing of large quantities of grain, most speculative in character.

The National Grain Corporation is the dealer in the grain business.

Just imagine a banking institution whose president was the head of a huge speculative grain corporation directing the destinies of both the bank and the grain corporation, and the latter speculating heavily in the market. How long would the directors of the bank permit this affiliation?

The taxpayers of the United States are furnishing the money for the Farm Board's operations. The Farm Board, through its various institutions, is acting as banker and speculator. To say the least, this is an intolerable situation.

I want the farmer to understand that I am not opposed to cooperative marketing. It undoubtedly has its place in the scheme of marketing. But I am opposed to the Government taking the taxpayers' money and, with bureaucrats who know nothing about marketing, organizing uneconomic schemes, bringing about demoralization of agricultural markets. Let us examine for a moment a set-up which the Farm Board is endeavoring to sell the public as a measure of farm relief. It does not matter whether the institution is a grain concern, a creamery, or a canning factory. The average investment of the farmer does not exceed $100. This institution must duplicate the plant, the capital, and the management of the independent concern. The third factor, or the management, is the weakest link. Let us concede that they are able to obtain sound management. It is a good concern in any line of business—in fact, a very unusual concern—that can meet competition in any line of trade or endeavor and pay 7 per cent on the money invested. If this given corporation paid 7 per cent return upon the investment, this would yield the average farmer $7. He can buy a municipal bond to yield him 4 per cent, with nine-tenths of the hazard eliminated.

Therefore, this would leave him an added return, if successful, of $3 a year. I want to ask my farmer friends throughout the country—and I am one of them—if this $3 spells farm relief for them? I answer "no." This cooperative marketing scheme is but "a red herring across the trail" to divert farmers' minds from the fact that a high protective tariff is being maintained for the benefit of the manufacturer, who can control his production, thereby increasing his profits and increasing the cost of the things the farmer buys. At the same time the destruction of the trade of the farmers' customers in Europe is brought about. This leaves the farmers' European customers unable to buy our farm surpluses and these surpluses in turn weigh down our domestic market.

There is no solution of the farm problem other than the broadening of our markets and the reduction of taxes. All the remedies of the quack doctors will fail. We have drifted far from Jefferson's principles, who said that "Government that governs least governs best."

Before closing my remarks I wish to quote from the autobiography of Thomas Jefferson, that great liberal who laid down as no man before him the principles of self-government: "It is not by the consolidation or concentration of powers, but by their distribution, that good government is effected. Were not this country already divided into States, that distribution must be made that each might do for itself what concerns itself directly, and what it can so much better do than a distant authority. Every State is again divided into counties, each to take care of what lies within its local bounds; each county again into townships or wards, to manage minuter details; and every ward into farms, to be governed each by its individual proprietor. Were we directed from Washington when to sow and when to reap, we should soon want bread."

I submit to my radio audience that the truth of this Jeffersonian statement has been demonstrated. With scores of duplicating bureaus in Washington directing the farmer not only "when to sow and when to reap," but directing every activity of life, including the preparation of the food for our tables and the manufacture of our clothes for children, and with our granaries bursting with food, yet our population is crying for bread.

There was no objection.

SENATE

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 23, 1932

The Chaplain, Rev. ZeBarney T. Phillips, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou in whose presence there is fullness of joy and life forevermore; grant to us Thy children that we may breathe the immortal air of this our world, and through the supreme influence of honest thought acquire our souls in confidence and peace, knowing that thoughts are a substantial world in which, with tendrils strong as flesh and blood, our pastime and our happiness will grow.

Make us ever mindful of the needs of others overborne by the stressing strain of life, baffled by its uncertainty, depressed by the deepening complexity of problems yet unsolved, too weak to bear the unsupportable fatigue of mental strain, that as we contemplate these avenues of time where ages have wrought and generations grown we may scatter seeds of kindness that will blossom and bring forth immortal fruit. Grant this for the sake of Him who is our joy and peace and comfort, Jesus Christ, Thy Son, our Lord. Amen.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I was requested to announce that the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] is necessarily detained in his home State on public matters.

Mr. COOLIDGE. I wish to announce that my colleague the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] is necessarily detained in his home State on public business. This announcement may stand for the day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-seven Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. Under the order of the Senate, Washington's Farewell Address will now be read by the senior Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH].

READING OF WASHINGTON'S FAREWELL ADDRESS

Mr. WALSH of Montana read the address, as follows:

To the people of the United States.

FRIENDS AND FELLOW CITIZENS: The period for a new election of a citizen to administer the executive government of the United States being not far distant, and the time actually arrived when your thoughts must be employed in designating the person who is to be clothed with that important trust, it appears to me proper, especially as it may conduce to a more distinct expression of the public voice, that I should now apprise you of the resolution I have formed, to decline being considered among the number of those, out of whom a choice is to be made.

I beg you, at the same time, to do me the justice to be assured, that this resolution has not been taken, without a strict regard to all the considerations appertaining to the relation which binds a dutiful citizen to his country; and that, in withdrawing the tender of service which silence in my situation might imply, I am influenced by no diminution of zeal for your future interest; no deficiency of grateful respect for your past kindness; but am supported by a full conviction that the step is compatible with both.

The acceptance of, and continuance hitherto in the office to which your suffrages have twice called me, have been a uniform sacrifice of inclination to the opinion of duty, and to a deference for what appeared to be your desire. I constantly hoped that it would have been much earlier in my power, consistently with motives which I was not at liberty to disregard, to return to that retirement from which I had been reluctantly drawn. The strength of my inclination to do this, previous to the last election, had even led to the preparation of an address to declare it to you; but mature reflection on the then perplexed and critical posture of our affairs with foreign nations, and the unanimous advice of persons entitled to my confidence, impelled me to abandon the idea.

I rejoice that the state of your concerns external as well as internal, no longer renders the pursuit of inclination incompatible with the sentiment of duty or propriety; and am persuaded, whatever partiality may be retained for my services, that in the present circumstances of our country, you will not disapprove my determination to retire.

The impressions with which I first undertook the arduous trust, were explained on the proper occasion. In the discharge of this trust, I will only say that I have, with good intentions, contributed towards the organization and administration of the government, the best exertions of which a very fallible judgment was capable. Not unconscious in the outset, of the inferiority of my qualifications, experience, in my own eyes, perhaps still more in the eyes of others, has strengthened the motives to diffidence of myself; and, every day, the increasing weight of years admonishes me more and more, that the shade of retirement is as necessary to me as it will be welcome. Satisfied that if any circumstances have given peculiar value to my services they were temporary, I have the consolation to believe that, while choice and prudence invite me to quit the political scene, patriotism does not forbid it.

In looking forward to the moment which is to terminate the career of my political life, my feelings do not permit me to suspend the deep acknowledgment of that debt of gratitude which I owe to my beloved country, for the many honors it has conferred upon me; still more for the steadfast confidence with which it has supported me; and for the opportunities I have thence enjoyed of manifesting my inviolable attachment, by services faithful and persevering, though in usefulness unequal to my zeal. If benefits have resulted to our country from these services, let it always be remembered to your praise, and as an instructive example in our annals, that under circumstances in which the passions, agitated in every direction, were liable to mislead amidst appearances sometimes dubious, vicissitudes of fortune often discouraging—in situations in which not unfrequently, want of success has countenanced the spirit of criticism,—the constancy of your support was the essential prop of the efforts, and a guarantee of the plans, by which they were effected. Profoundly penetrated with this idea, I shall carry it with me to my grave, as a strong incitement to unceasing vows that heaven may continue to you the choicest tokens of its beneficence—that your union and brotherly affection may be perpetual—that the free constitution, which is the work of your hands, may be sacredly maintained—that its administration in every department may be stamped with wisdom and virtue—that, in fine, the happiness of the people of these states, under the auspices of liberty, may be made complete by so careful a preservation, and so prudent a use of this blessing, as will acquire to them the glory of recommending it to the applause, the affection and adoption of every nation which is yet a stranger to it.

Here, perhaps, I ought to stop. But a solicitude for your welfare, which cannot end but with my life, and the apprehension of danger, natural to that solicitude, urge me, on an occasion like the present, to offer to your solemn contemplation, and to recommend to your frequent review, some sentiments which are the result of much reflection, of no inconsiderable observation, and which appear to me all important to the permanency of your felicity as a people. These will be offered to you with the more freedom, as you can only see in them the disinterested warnings of a parting friend, who can possibly have no personal motive to bias his counsel. Nor can I forget, as an encouragement to it, your indulgent reception of my sentiments on a former and not dissimilar occasion.

Interwoven as is the love of liberty with every ligament of your hearts, no recommendation of mine is necessary to fortify or confirm the attachment.

The unity of government which constitutes you one people, is also now dear to you. It is justly so; for it is a main pillar in the edifice of your real independence; the support of your tranquility at home: your peace abroad; of your safety; of your prosperity; of that very liberty which you so highly prize. But, as it is easy to foresee that, from different causes and from different quarters much pains will be taken, many artifices employed, to weaken in your minds the conviction of this truth; as this is the point in your political fortress against which the batteries of internal and external enemies will be most constantly and actively (though often covertly and insidiously) directed; it is of infinite moment, that you should properly estimate the immense value of your national union to your collective and individual happiness; that you should cherish a cordial, habitual, and immovable attachment to it; accustoming yourselves to think and speak of it as of the palladium of your political safety and prosperity; watching for its preservation with jealous anxiety; discountenancing whatever may suggest even a suspicion that it can, in any event, be abandoned; and indignantly frowning upon the first dawning of every attempt to alienate any portion of our country from the rest, or to enfeeble the sacred ties which now link together the various parts.

For this you have every inducement of sympathy and interest. Citizens by birth, or choice, of a common country, that country has a right to concentrate your affections. The name of American, which belongs to you in your national capacity, must always exalt the just pride of patriotism, more than any appellation derived from local discriminations. With slight shades of difference, you have the same religion, manners, habits, and political principles. You have, in a common cause, fought and triumphed together; the independence and liberty you possess, are the work of joint counsels, and joint efforts, of common dangers, sufferings and successes.

But these considerations, however powerfully they address themselves to your sensibility, are greatly outweighed by those which apply more immediately to your interest.—Here, every portion of our country finds the most commanding motives for carefully guarding and preserving the union of the whole.

The north, in an unrestrained intercourse with the south, protected by the equal laws of a common government, finds in the productions of the latter, great additional resources of maritime and commercial enterprise, and precious materials of manufacturing industry.—The south, in the same intercourse, benefiting by the same agency of the north, sees its agriculture grow and its commerce expand. Turning partly into its own channels the seamen of the north, it finds its particular navigation invigorated; and while it contributes, in different ways, to nourish and increase the general mass of the national navigation, it looks forward to the protection of a maritime strength, to which itself is unequally adapted. The east, in a like intercourse with the west, already finds, and in the progressive improvement of interior communications by land and water, will more and more find a valuable vent for the commodities which it brings from abroad, or manufactures at home. The west derives from the east supplies requisite to its growth and comfort—and what is perhaps of still greater consequence, it must of necessity owe the secure enjoyment of indispensable outlets for its own productions, to the weight, influence, and the future maritime strength of the Atlantic side of the Union, directed by an indissoluble community of interest as one nation. Any other tenure by which the west can hold this essential advantage, whether derived from its own separate strength; or from an apostate and unnatural connection with any foreign power, must be intrinsically precarious.

While then every part of our country thus feels an immediate and particular interest in union, all the parts combined cannot fail to find in the united mass of means and efforts, greater strength, greater resource, proportionably greater security from external danger, a less frequent interruption of their peace by foreign nations; and, what is of inestimable value, they must derive from union, an exemption from those broils and wars between themselves, which so frequently afflict neighboring countries not tied together by the same government; which their own rivalship alone would be sufficient to produce, but which opposite foreign alliances, attachments, and intrigues, would stimulate and embitter.—Hence likewise, they will avoid the necessity of those overgrown military establishments, which under any form of government are inauspicious to liberty, and which are to be regarded as particularly hostile to republican liberty. In this sense it is, that your union ought to be considered as a main prop of your liberty, and that the love of the one ought to endear to you the preservation of the other.

These considerations speak a persuasive language to every reflecting and virtuous mind, and exhibit the continuance of the union as a primary object of patriotic desire. Is there a doubt whether a common government can embrace so large a sphere? let experience solve it. To listen to mere speculation in such a case were criminal. We are authorized to hope that a proper organization of the whole, with the auxiliary agency of governments for the respective subdivisions, will afford a happy issue to the experiment. It is well worth a fair and full experiment. With such powerful and obvious motives to union, affecting all parts of our country, while experience shall not have demonstrated its impracticability, there will always be reason to distrust the patriotism of those who, in any quarter, may endeavor to weaken its hands.

In contemplating the causes which may disturb our Union, it occurs as matter of serious concern, that any ground should have been furnished for characterizing parties by geographical discriminations,—northern and southern—Atlantic and western; whence designing men may endeavor to excite a belief that there is a real difference of local interests and views. One of the expedients of party to acquire influence within particular districts, is to misrepresent the opinions and aims of other districts. You cannot shield yourselves too much against the jealousies and heart burnings which spring from these misrepresentations: they tend to render alien to each other those who ought to be bound together by fraternal affection. The inhabitants of our western country have lately had a useful lesson on this head: they have seen, in the negotiation by the executive, and in the unanimous ratification by the senate of the treaty with Spain, and in the universal satisfaction at the event throughout the United States, a decisive proof how unfounded were the suspicions propagated among them of a policy in the general government and in the Atlantic states, unfriendly to their interests in regard to the Mississippi. They have been witnesses to the formation of two treaties, that with Great Britain and that with Spain, which secure to them everything they could desire, in respect to our foreign relations, towards confirming their prosperity. Will it not be their wisdom to rely for the preservation of these advantages on the union by which they were procured? will they not henceforth be deaf to those advisers, if such they are, who would sever them from their brethren and connect them with aliens?

To the efficacy and permanency of your Union, a government for the whole is indispensable. No alliances, however strict, between the parts can be an adequate substitute; they must inevitably experience the infractions and interruptions which all alliances, in all times, have experienced. Sensible of this momentous truth, you have improved upon your first essay, by the adoption of a constitution of government, better calculated than your former, for an intimate union, and for the efficacious management of your common concerns. This government, the offspring of our own choice, uninfluenced and unawed, adopted upon full investigation and mature deliberation, completely free in its principles, in the distribution of its powers, uniting security with energy, and containing within itself a provision for its own amendment, has a just claim to your confidence and your support. Respect for its authority, compliance with its laws, acquiescence in its measures, are duties enjoined by the fundamental maxims of true liberty. The basis of our political systems is the right of the people to make and to alter their constitutions of government.—But the constitution which at any time exists, until changed by an explicit and authentic act of the whole people, is sacredly obligatory upon all. The very idea of the power, and the right of the people to establish government, presuppose the duty of every individual to obey the established government.

All obstructions to the execution of the laws, all combinations and associations under whatever plausible character, with the real design to direct, control, counteract, or awe the regular deliberations and action of the constituted authorities, are destructive of this fundamental principle, and of fatal tendency.—They serve to organize faction, to give it an artificial and extraordinary force, to put in the place of the delegated will of the nation the will of party, often a small but artful and enterprising minority of the community; and, according to the alternate triumphs of different parties, to make the public administration the mirror of the ill concerted and incongruous projects of faction, rather than the organ of consistent and wholesome plans digested by common councils, and modified by mutual interests.

However combinations or associations of the above description may now and then answer popular ends, they are likely, in the course of time and things, to become potent engines, by which cunning, ambitious, and unprincipled men, will be enabled to subvert the power of the people, and to usurp for themselves the reins of government; destroying afterwards the very engines which have lifted them to unjust dominion.

Towards the preservaton of your government and the permanency of your present happy state, it is requisite, not only that you steadily discountenance irregular opposition to its acknowledged authority, but also that you resist with care the spirit of innovation upon its principles, however specious the pretext. One method of assault may be to effect, in the forms of the constitution, alterations which will impair the energy of the system; and thus to undermine what cannot be directly overthrown. In all the changes to which you may be invited, remember that time and habit are at least as necessary to fix the true character of governments, as of other human institutions:—that experience is the surest standard by which to test the real tendency of the existing constitution of a country:—that facility in changes, upon the credit of mere hypothesis and opinion, exposes to perpetual change from the endless variety of hypothesis and opinion: and remember, especially, that for the efficient management of your common interests in a country so extensive as ours, a government of as much vigor as is consistent with the perfect security of liberty is indispensable. Liberty itself will find in such a government, with powers properly distributed and adjusted, its surest guardian. It is, indeed, little else than a name, where the government is too feeble to withstand the enterprises of faction, to confine each member of the society within the limits prescribed by the laws, and to maintain all in the secure and tranquil enjoyment of the rights of person and property.

I have already intimated to you the danger of parties in the state, with particular references to the founding them on geographical discrimination. Let me now take a more comprehensive view, and warn you in the most solemn manner against the baneful effects of the spirit of party generally.

This spirit, unfortunately, is inseparable from our nature, having its root in the strongest passions of the human mind.—It exists under different shapes in all governments, more or less stifled, controlled, or repressed; but in those of the popular form it is seen in its greatest rankness, and is truly their worst enemy.

The alternate domination of one faction over another, sharpened by the spirit of revenge natural to party dissension, which in different ages and countries has perpetrated the most horrid enormities, is itself a frightful despotism.—But this leads at length to a more formal and permanent despotism. The disorders and miseries which result, gradually incline the minds of men to seek security and repose in the absolute power of an individual; and, sooner or later, the chief of some prevailing faction, more able or more fortunate than his competitors, turns this disposition to the purpose of his own elevation on the ruins of public liberty.

Without looking forward to an extremity of this kind, (which nevertheless ought not to be entirely out of sight) the common and continual mischiefs of the spirit of party are sufficient to make it the interest and duty of a wise people to discourage and restrain it.

It serves always to distract the public councils, and enfeeble the public administration. It agitates the community with ill founded jealousies and false alarms; kindles the animosity of one part against another; foments occasional riot and insurrection. It opens the door to foreign influence and corruption, which finds a facilitated access to the government itself through the channels of party passions. Thus the policy and the will of one country are subjected to the policy and will of another.

There is an opinion that parties in free countries are useful checks upon the administration of the government, and serve to keep alive the spirit of liberty. This within certain limits is probably true; and in governments of a monarchial cast, patriotism may look with indulgence, if not with favor, upon the spirit of party. But in those of the popular character, in governments purely elective, it is a spirit not to be encouraged. From their natural tendency, it is certain there will always be enough of that spirit for every salutary purpose. And there being constant danger of excess, the effort ought to be, by force of public opinion, to mitigate and assuage it. A fire not to be quenched, it demands a uniform vigilance to prevent it bursting into a flame, lest instead of warming, it should consume.

It is important likewise, that the habits of thinking in a free country should inspire caution in those intrusted with its administration, to confine themselves within their respective constitutional spheres, avoiding in the exercise of the powers of one department, to encroach upon another. The spirit of encroachment tends to consolidate the powers of all the departments in one, and thus to create, whatever the form of government, a real despotism. A just estimate of that love of power and proneness to abuse it which predominate in the human heart, is sufficient to satisfy us of the truth of this position. The necessity of reciprocal checks in the exercise of political power, by dividing and distributing it into different depositories, and constituting each the guardian of the public weal against invasions of the others, has been evinced by experiments ancient and modern: some of them in our country and under our own eyes.—To preserve them must be as necessary as to institute them. If, in the opinion of the people, the distribution or modification of the constitutional powers be in any particular wrong, let it be corrected by an amendment in the way which the constitution designates.—But let there be no change by usurpation; for though this, in one instance, may be the instrument of good, it is the customary weapon by which free governments are destroyed. The precedent must always greatly overbalance in permanent evil, any partial or transient benefit which the use can at any time yield.

Of all the dispositions and habits which lead to political prosperity, religion and morality are indispensable supports. In vain would that man claim the tribute of patriotism, who should labor to subvert these great pillars of human happiness, these firmest props of the duties of men and citizens. The mere politician, equally with the pious man, ought to respect and to cherish them. A volume could not trace all their connections with private and public felicity. Let it simply be asked, where is the security for property, for reputation, for life, if the sense of religious obligation desert the oaths which are the instruments of investigation in courts of justice? and let us with caution indulge the supposition that morality can be maintained without religion. Whatever may be conceded to the influence of refined education on minds of peculiar structure, reason and experience both forbid us to expect, that national morality can prevail in exclusion of religious principle.

It is substantially true, that virtue or morality is a necessary spring of popular government. The rule, indeed, extends with more or less force to every species of free government. Who that is a sincere friend to it can look with indifference upon attempts to shake the foundation of the fabric?

Promote, then, as an object of primary importance, institutions for the general diffusion of knowledge. In proportion as the structure of a government gives force to public opinion, it should be enlightened.

As a very important source of strength and security, cherish public credit. One method of preserving it is to use it as sparingly as possible, avoiding occasions of expense by cultivating peace, but remembering, also, that timely disbursements, to prepare for danger, frequently prevent much greater disbursements to repel it; avoiding likewise the accumulation of debt, not only by shunning occasions of expense, but by vigorous exertions, in time of peace, to discharge the debts which unavoidable wars may have occasioned, not ungenerously throwing upon posterity the burden which we ourselves ought to bear. The execution of these maxims belongs to your representatives, but it is necessary that public opinion should co-operate. To facilitate to them the performance of their duty, it is essential that you should practically bear in mind, that towards the payment of debts there must be revenue; that to have revenue there must be taxes; that no taxes can be devised which are not more or less inconvenient and unpleasant; that the intrinsic embarrassment inseparable from the selection of the proper object (which is always a choice of difficulties) ought to be a decisive motive for a candid construction of the conduct of the government in making it, and for a spirit of acquiescence in the measures for obtaining revenue, which the public exigencies may at any time dictate.

Observe good faith and justice towards all nations; cultivate peace and harmony with all. Religion and morality enjoin this conduct, and can it be that good policy does not equally enjoin it? It will be worthy of a free, enlightened, and, at no distant period, a great nation, to give to mankind the magnanimous and too novel example of a people always guided by an exalted justice and benevolence. Who can doubt but, in the course of time and things, the fruits of such a plan would richly repay any temporary advantages which might be lost by a steady adherence to it; can it be that Providence has not connected the permanent felicity of a nation with its virtue? The experiment, at least, is recommended by every sentiment which ennobles human nature. Alas! is it rendered impossible by its vices?

In the execution of such a plan, nothing is more essential than that permanent, inveterate antipathies against particular nations and passionate attachments for others, should be excluded; and that, in place of them, just and amicable feelings towards all should be cultivated. The nation which indulges towards another an habitual hatred, or an habitual fondness, is in some degree a slave. It is a slave to its animosity or to its affection, either of which is sufficient to lead it astray from its duty and its interest. Antipathy in one nation against another, disposes each more readily to offer insult and injury, to lay hold of slight causes of umbrage, and to be haughty and intractable when accidental or trifling occasions of dispute occur. Hence, frequent collisions, obstinate, envenomed, and bloody contests. The nation, prompted by ill will and resentment, sometimes impels to war the government, contrary to the best calculations of policy. The government sometimes participates in the national propensity, and adopts through passion what reason would reject; at other times, it makes the animosity of the nation subservient to projects of hostility, instigated by pride, ambition, and other sinister and pernicious motives. The peace often, sometimes perhaps the liberty of nations, has been the victim.

So likewise, a passionate attachment of one nation for another produces a variety of evils. Sympathy for the favorite nation, facilitating the illusion of an imaginary common interest, in cases where no real common interest exists, and infusing into one the enmities of the other, betrays the former into a participation in the quarrels and wars of the latter, without adequate inducements or justifications. It leads also to concessions, to the favorite nation, of privileges denied to others, which is apt doubly to injure the nation making the concessions, by unnecessarily parting with what ought to have been retained, and by exciting jealousy, ill will, and a disposition to retaliate in the parties from whom equal privileges are withheld; and it gives to ambitious, corrupted or deluded citizens who devote themselves to the favorite nation, facility to betray or sacrifice the interests of their own country, without odium, sometimes even with popularity; gilding with the appearances of a virtuous sense of obligation, a commendable deference for public opinion, or a laudable zeal for public good, the base or foolish compliances of ambition, corruption, or infatuation.

As avenues to foreign influence in innumerable ways, such attachments are particularly alarming to the truly enlightened and independent patriot. How many opportunities do they afford to tamper with domestic factions, to practice the arts of seduction, to mislead public opinion, to influence or awe the public councils!—Such an attachment of a small or weak, towards a great and powerful nation, dooms the former to be the satellite of the latter.

Against the insidious wiles of foreign influence, (I conjure you to believe me fellow citizens,) the jealousy of a free people ought to be constantly awake; since history and experience prove, that foreign influence is one of the most baneful foes of republican government. But that jealousy, to be useful, must be impartial, else it becomes the instrument of the very influence to be avoided, instead of a defense against it. Excessive partiality for one foreign nation and excessive dislike for another, cause those whom they actuate to see danger only on one side, and serve to veil and even second the arts of influence on the other. Real patriots, who may resist the intrigues of the favorite, are liable to become suspected and odious; while its tools and dupes usurp the applause and confidence of the people, to surrender their interests.

The great rule of conduct for us, in regard to foreign nations, is, in extending our commercial relations, to have with them as little political connection as possible. So far as we have already formed engagements, let them be fulfilled with perfect good faith:—Here let us stop.

Europe has a set of primary interests, which to us have none, or a very remote relation. Hence, she must be engaged in frequent controversies, the causes of which are essentially foreign to our concerns. Hence, therefore, it must be unwise in us to implicate ourselves, by artificial ties, in the ordinary vicissitudes of her politics, or the ordinary combinations and collisions of her friendships or enmities.

Our detached and distant situation invites and enables us to pursue a different course. If we remain one people, under an efficient government, the period is not far off when we may defy material injury from external annoyance; when we may take such an attitude as will cause the neutrality we may at any time resolve upon, to be scrupulously respected; when belligerent nations, under the impossibility of making acquisitions upon us, will not lightly hazard the giving us provocation, when we may choose peace or war, as our interest, guided by justice, shall counsel.

Why forego the advantages of so peculiar a situation? Why quit our own to stand upon foreign ground? Why, by interweaving our destiny with that of any part of Europe, entangle our peace and prosperity in the toils of European ambition, rivalship, interest, humor, or caprice?

It is our true policy to steer clear of permanent alliance with any portion of the foreign world; so far, I mean, as we are now at liberty to do it; for let me not be understood as capable of patronizing infidelity to existing engagements. I hold the maxim no less applicable to public than private affairs, that honesty is always the best policy. I repeat it, therefore, let those engagements be observed in their genuine sense. But in my opinion, it is unnecessary, and would be unwise to extend them.

Taking care always to keep ourselves by suitable establishments, on a respectable defensive posture, we may safely trust to temporary alliances for extraordinary emergencies.

Harmony, and a liberal intercourse with all nations, are recommended by policy, humanity, and interest. But even our commercial policy should hold an equal and impartial hand; neither seeking nor granting exclusive favors or preferences; consulting the natural course of things; diffusing and diversifying by gentle means the streams of commerce, but forcing nothing; establishing with powers so disposed, in order to give trade a stable course, to define the rights of our merchants, and to enable the government to support them, conventional rules of intercourse, the best that present circumstances and mutual opinion will permit, but temporary, and liable to be from time to time abandoned or varied as experience and circumstances shall dictate; constantly keeping in view, that it is folly in one nation to look for disinterested favors from another; that it must pay with a portion of its independence for whatever it may accept under that character; that by such acceptance, it may place itself in the condition of having given equivalents for nominal favors, and yet of being reproached with ingratitude for not giving more. There can be no greater error than to expect, or calculate upon real favors from nation to nation. It is an illusion which experience must cure, which a just pride ought to discard.

In offering to you, my countrymen, these counsels of an old and affectionate friend, I dare not hope they will make the strong and lasting impression I could wish; that they will control the usual current of the passions, or prevent our nation from running the course which has hitherto marked the destiny of nations, but if I may even flatter myself that they may be productive of some partial benefit, some occasional good; that they may now and then recur to moderate the fury of party spirit, to warn against the mischiefs of foreign intrigue, to guard against the impostures of pretended patriotism; this hope will be a full recompense for the solicitude for your welfare by which they have been dictated.

How far, in the discharge of my official duties, I have been guided by the principles which have been delineated, the public records and other evidences of my conduct must witness to you and to the world. To myself, the assurance of my own conscience is, that I have, at least, believed myself to be guided by them.

In relation to the still subsisting war in Europe, my proclamation of the 22d of April, 1793, is the index to my plan. Sanctioned by your approving voice, and by that of your representatives in both houses of congress, the spirit of that measure has continually governed me, uninfluenced by any attempts to deter or divert me from it.

After deliberate examination, with the aid of the best lights I could obtain, I was well satisfied that our country, under all the circumstances of the case, had a right to take, and was bound, in duty and interest, to take a neutral position. Having taken it, I determined, as far as should depend upon me, to maintain it with moderation, perseverance and firmness.

The considerations which respect the right to hold this conduct, it is not necessary on this occasion to detail. I will only observe that, according to my understanding of the matter, that right, so far from being denied by any of the belligerent powers, has been virtually admitted by all.

The duty of holding a neutral conduct may be inferred, without any thing more, from the obligation which justice and humanity impose on every nation, in cases in which it is free to act, to maintain inviolate the relations of peace and amity towards other nations.

The inducements of interest for observing that conduct will best be referred to your own reflections and experience. With me, a predominant motive has been to endeavor to gain time to our country to settle and mature its yet recent institutions, and to progress, without interruption, to that degree of strength, and consistency which is necessary to give it, humanly speaking, the command of its own fortunes.

Though in reviewing the incidents of my administration, I am unconscious of intentional error, I am nevertheless too sensible of my defects not to think it probable that I may have committed many errors. Whatever they may be, I fervently beseech the Almighty to avert or mitigate the evils to which they may tend. I shall also carry with me the hope that my country will never cease to view them with indulgence; and that, after forty-five years of my life dedicated to its service, with an upright zeal, the faults of incompetent abilities will be consigned to oblivion, as myself must soon be to the mansions of rest.

Relying on its kindness in this as in other things, and actuated by that fervent love towards it, which is so natural to a man who views in it the native soil of himself and his progenitors for several generations; I anticipate with pleasing expectation that retreat in which I promise myself to realize, without alloy, the sweet enjoyment of partaking, in the midst of my fellow citizens, the benign influence of good laws under a free government—the ever favorite object of my heart, and the happy reward, as I trust, of our mutual cares, labors and dangers.

GEO. WASHINGTON.

UNITED STATES,
17th September, 1796.

LORD BROUGHAM'S TRIBUTE TO GEORGE WASHINGTON

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I should like to read into the RECORD an estimate of Washington from a source outside of our own country. It was written some 60 years ago. It was not written in contemplation of a public address, but is the cool, calm, estimate of the study. It is from the pen of Lord Brougham. I shall read only the closing paragraphs:

If profound sagacity, unshaken steadiness of purpose, the entire subjugation of all the passions which carry havoc through ordinary minds, and oftentimes lay waste the fairest prospects of greatness—nay, the discipline of those feelings which are wont to lull or to seduce genius, and to mar and to cloud over the aspect of virtue herself—joined with, or rather leading to the most absolute self-denial, the most habitual and exclusive devotion to principle—if these things can constitute a great character, without either quickness of apprehension, or resources of information, or inventive powers, or any brilliant quality that might dazzle the vulgar—then surely Washington was the greatest man that ever lived in this world uninspired by Divine wisdom, and unsustained by supernatural virtue.

His courage, whether in battle or in council, was as perfect as might be expected from this pure and steady temper of soul. A perfect, just man, with a thoroughly firm resolution never to be misled by others, any more than to be by others overawed; never to be seduced or betrayed, or hurried away by his own weaknesses or self-delusions, any more than by other men's arts; nor ever to be disheartened by the most complicated difficulties, any more than to be spoilt on the giddy heights of fortune—such was this great man—great, preeminently great, whether we regard him sustaining alone the whole weight of campaigns all but desperate, or gloriously terminating a just warfare by his resources and his courage—presiding over the jarring elements of his political council, alike deaf to the storms of all extremes—or directing the formation of a new government for a great people, the first time that so vast an experiment had ever been tried by man—or finally retiring from the supreme power to which his virtue had raised him over the nation he had created, and whose destinies he had guided as long as his aid was required—retiring with the veneration of all parties, of all nations, of all mankind, in order that the rights of men might be conserved, and that his example never might be appealed to by vulgar tyrants. This is the consummate glory of Washington; a triumphant warrior where the most sanguine had a right to despair; a successful ruler in all the difficulties of a course wholly untried; but a warrior, whose sword only left its sheath when the first law of our nature commanded it to be drawn; and a ruler who, having tasted of supreme power, gently and unostentatiously desired that the cup might pass from him, nor would suffer more to wet his lips than the most solemn and sacred duty to his country and his God required!

To his latest breath did this great patriot maintain the noble character of a captain—the patron of peace, and a statesman—the friend of justice. Dying, he bequeathed to his heirs the sword which he had worn in the war for liberty, and charged them, "Never to take it from the scabbard but in self-defense, or in defense of their country and her freedom; and commanding them that when it should thus be drawn they should never sheath it nor ever give it up, but prefer falling with it in their hands to the relinquishment thereof"—words, the majesty and simple eloquence of which are not surpassed in the oratory of Athens and Rome.

It will be the duty of the historian and the sage in all ages to let no occasion pass commemorating this illustrious man; and until time shall be no more will a test of the progress which our race has made in wisdom and in virtue be derived from the veneration paid to the immortal name of Washington.

DANIEL WEBSTER'S SPEECH ON GEORGE WASHINGTON

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, I hold in my hand a reprint of the speech made by Daniel Webster 100 years ago yesterday in honor of the one hundredth birthday of George Washington to a group of men who were gathered at a dinner in this city. That speech is so often referred to in the press that I think it ought to have a wider reading, and I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the speech was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

I rise, gentlemen, to propose to you the name of that great man, in commemoration of whose birth and in honor of whose character and services we are assembled.

I am sure that I express a sentiment common to everyone present when I say that there is something more than ordinarily solemn and affecting in this occasion.

We are met to testify our regard for him whose name is intimately blended with whatever belongs most essentially to the prosperity, the liberty, the free institutions, and the renown of our country. That name was of power to rally a nation in the hour of thick-thronging public disasters and calamities; that name shone amid the storm of war a beacon light to cheer and guide the country's friends; it flamed, too, like a meteor to repel her foes. That name in the days of peace was a loadstone, attracting to itself a whole people's confidence, a whole people's love, and the whole world's respect. That name, descending with all time, spreading over the whole earth, and uttered in all the languages belonging to the tribes and races of men, will forever be pronounced with affectionate gratitude by everyone in whose breast there shall arise an aspiration for human rights and human liberty.

We perform this grateful duty, gentlemen, at the expiration of a hundred years from his birth, near the place, so cherished and beloved by him, where his dust now reposes, and in the Capital which bears his own immortal name.

All experience evinces that human sentiments are strongly influenced by associations. The recurrence of anniversaries, or of longer periods of time naturally freshens the recollection and deepens the impression of events with which they are historically connected. Renowned places, also, have a power to awaken feeling, which all acknowledge. No American can pass by the fields of Bunker Hill, Monmouth, and Camden as if they were ordinary spots on the earth's surface. Whoever visits them feels the sentiment of love of country kindling anew, as if the spirit that belonged to the transactions which have rendered these places distinguished still hovered round, with power to move and excite all who in future time may approach them.

But neither of these sources of emotion equals the power with which great moral examples affect the mind. When sublime virtues cease to be abstractions, when they become embodied in human character, and exemplified in human conduct, we should be false to our own nature if we did not indulge in the spontaneous effusions of our gratitude and our admiration. A true lover of the virtue of patriotism delights to contemplate its purest models; and that love of country may be well suspected which affects to soar so high into the regions of sentiment as to be lost and absorbed in the abstract feeling, and becomes too elevated or too refined to glow with fervor in the commendation or the love of individual benefactors. All this is unnatural. It is as if one should be so enthusiastic a lover of poetry as to care nothing for Homer or Milton; so passionately attached to eloquence as to be indifferent to Tully and Chatham; or such a devotee to the arts, in such an ecstasy with the elements of beauty, proportion, and expression, as to regard the masterpieces of Raphael and Michelangelo with coldness or contempt. We may be assured, gentlemen, that he who really loves the thing itself, loves its finest exhibitions. A true friend of his country loves her friends and benefactors, and thinks it no degradation to commend and commemorate them. The voluntary outpouring of the public feeling made to-day from the North to the South and from the East to the West proves this sentiment to be both just and natural. In the cities and in the villages, in the public temples, and in the family circles, among all ages and sexes, gladdened voices to-day bespeak grateful hearts and a freshened recollection of the virtues of the Father of his Country. And it will be so in all time to come so long as public virtue is itself an object of regard. The ingenuous youth of America will hold up to themselves the bright model of Washington's example, and study to be what they behold; they will contemplate his character till all its virtues spread out and display themselves to their delightful vision, as the earliest astronomers, the shepherds on the plains of Babylon, gazed at the stars till they saw them form into clusters and constellations, overpowering at length the eyes of the beholders with the united blaze of a thousand lights.

Gentlemen, we are at the point of a century from the birth of Washington; and what a century it has been! During its course the human mind has seemed to proceed with a sort of geometric velocity, accomplishing for human intelligence and human freedom more than had been done in fives or tens of centuries preceding. Washington stands at the commencement of a new era as well as at the head of the New World. A century from the birth of Washington has changed the world. The country of Washington has been the theater on which a great part of that change has been wrought, and Washington himself a principal agent by which it has been accomplished. His age and his country are equally full of wonders; and of both he is the chief.

If the poetical prediction uttered a few years before his birth be true; if, indeed, it be designed by Providence that the grandest exhibition of human character and human affairs shall be made on this theater of the western world; if it be true that—

> "The first four acts already past,
> A fifth shall close the drama of the day;
> Time's noblest offspring is the last,"

how could this imposing, swelling, final scene be appropriately opened; how could its intense interest be adequately sustained but by the introduction of just such a character as our Washington?

Washington had attained his manhood when that spark of liberty was struck out in his own country, which has since kindled into a flame, and shot its beams over the earth. In the flow of a century from his birth the world has changed in science, in arts, in the extent of commerce, in the improvement of navigation, and in all that relates to the civilization of man. But it is the spirit of human freedom, the new elevation of individual man, in his moral, social, and political character, leading the whole long train of other improvements, which has most remarkably distinguished the era. Society in this century has not made its progress, like Chinese skill, by a greater acuteness of ingenuity in trifles; it has not merely lashed itself to an increased speed round the old circles of thought and action but it has assumed a new character; it has raised itself from beneath governments to a participation in governments; it has mixed moral and political objects with the daily pursuits of individual men; and, with a freedom and strength before altogether unknown, it has applied to these objects the whole power of the human understanding. It has been the era, in short, when the social principle has triumphed over the feudal principle, when society has maintained its rights against military power and established on foundations never hereafter to be shaken its competency to govern itself.

It was the extraordinary fortune of Washington that, having been intrusted, in Revolutionary times, with the supreme military command and having fulfilled that trust with equal renown for wisdom and for valor, he should be placed at the head of the first government in which an attempt was to be made on a large scale to rear the fabric of social order on the basis of a written constitution and of a pure representative principle. A government was to be established without a throne, without an aristocracy, without castes, orders, or privileges; and this government, instead of being a democracy, existing and acting within the walls of a single city, was to be extended over a vast country, of different climates, interest, and habits, and of various communions of our common Christian faith. The experiment certainly was entirely new. A popular government of this extent, it was evident, could be framed only by carrying into full effect the principle of representation or of delegated power; and the world was to see whether society could, by the strength of this principle, maintain its own peace and good government, carry forward its own great interests, and conduct itself to political renown and glory. By the benignity of Providence, this experiment, so full of interest to us and to our posterity forever, so full of interest, indeed, to the world in its present generation and in all its generations to come, was suffered to commence under the guidance of Washington. Destined for this high career, he was fitted for it by wisdom, by virtue, by patriotism, by discretion, by whatever can inspire confidence in man toward man. In entering on the untried scenes, early disappointment and the premature extinction of all hope of success would have been certain, had it not been that there did exist throughout the country, in a most extraordinary degree, an unwavering trust in him who stood at the helm.

I remarked, gentlemen, that the whole world was and is interested in the result of this experiment. And is it not so? Do we deceive ourselves, or is it true that at this moment the career which this Government is running is among the most attractive objects to the civilized world? Do we deceive ourselves, or is it true that at this moment that love of liberty and that understanding of its true principles which are flying over the whole earth, as on the wings of all the winds, are really and truly of American origin?

At the period of the birth of Washington, there existed in Europe no political liberty in large communities, except in the Provinces of Holland, and except that England herself had set a great example, so far as it went, by her glorious Revolution of 1688. Everywhere else despotic power was predominant, and the feudal or military principle held the mass of mankind in hopeless bondage. One-half of Europe was crushed beneath the Bourbon scepter, and no conception of political liberty, no hope even of religious toleration existed among that nation which was America's first ally. The king was the state, the king was the country, the king was all. There was one king, with power not derived from his people, and too high to be questioned; and the rest were all subjects, with no political right but obedience. All above was intangible power, all below quiet subjection. A recent occurrence in the French chambers shows us how public opinion on these subjects is changed. A minister had spoken of the "king's subjects." "There are no subjects," exclaimed hundreds of voices at once, "in a country where the people make the king."

Gentlemen, the spirit of human liberty and of free government, nurtured and grown into strength and beauty in America, has stretched its course into the midst of the nations. Like an emanation from heaven it has gone forth, and it will not return void. It must change, it is fast changing, the face of the earth. Our great, our high duty is to show, in our own example, that this spirit is a spirit of health as well as a spirit of power; that its benignity is as great as its strength; that its efficiency to secure individual rights, social relations, and moral order is equal to the irresistible force with which it prostrates principalities and powers. The world at this moment is regarding us with a willing but something of a fearful admiration. Its deep and awful anxiety is to learn whether free states may be stable, as well as free; whether popular power may be trusted, as well as feared; in short, whether wise, regular, and virtuous self-government is a vision for the contemplation of theorists, or a truth established, illustrated, and brought into practice in the country of Washington.

Gentlemen, for the earth which we inhabit, and the whole circle of the sun, for all the unborn races of mankind, we seem to hold in our hands, for their weal or woe, the fate of this experiment. If we fail, who shall venture the repetition? If our example shall prove to be one, not of encouragement but of terror, not fit to be imitated but fit only to be shunned, where else shall the world look for free models? If this great western sun be struck out of the firmament, at what other fountain shall the lamp of liberty hereafter be lighted? What other orb shall emit a ray to glimmer, even on the darkness of the world?

There is no danger of our overrating or overstating the important part which we are now acting in human affairs. It should not flatter our personal self-respect, but it should reanimate our patriotic virtues, and inspire us with a deeper and more solemn sense, both of our privileges and of our duties. We can not wish better for our country, nor for the world, than that the same spirit which influenced Washington may influence all who succeed him; and that the same blessing from above, which attended his efforts, may also attend theirs.

The principles of Washington's administration are not left doubtful. They are to be found in the Constitution itself, in the great measures recommended and approved by him, in his speeches to Congress, and in that most interesting paper, his Farewell Address to the People of the United States. The success of the Government under his administration is the highest proof of the soundness of these principles. And, after an experience of 35 years, what is there which an enemy could condemn? What is there which either his friends, or the friends of the country, could wish to have been otherwise? I speak, of course, of great measures and leading principles.

In the first place, all his measures were right in their intent. He stated the whole basis of his own great character when he told the country, in the homely phrase of the proverb, that honesty is the best policy. One of the most striking things ever said of him is that "he changed mankind's ideas of political greatness." To commanding talents, and to success, the common elements of such greatness, he added a disregard of self, a spotlessness of motive, a steady submission to every public and private duty, which threw far into the shade the whole crowd of vulgar great. The object of his regard was the whole country. No part of it was enough to fill his enlarged patriotism. His love of glory, so far as that may be supposed to have influenced him at all, spurned everything short of general approbation. It would have been nothing to him, that his partisans or his favorites outnumbered, or outvoted, or outmanaged, or outclamored, those of other leaders. He had no favorites; he rejected all partisanship; and acting honestly for the universal good, he deserved, what he has so richly enjoyed, the universal love.

His principle it was to act right, and to trust the people for support; his principle it was not to follow the lead of sinister and selfish ends, nor to rely on the little arts of party delusion to obtain public sanction for such a course. Born for his country and for the world, he did not "give up to party what was meant for mankind." The consequence is, that this fame is as durable as his principles, as lasting as truth and virtue themselves. While the hundreds whom party excitement, and temporary circumstances, and casual combinations, have raised into transient notoriety, sink again, like thin bubbles, bursting and dissolving into the great ocean, Washington's fame is like the rock which bounds that ocean, and at whose feet its billows are destined to break harmlessly forever.

The maxims upon which Washington conducted our foreign relations were few and simple. The first was an entire and indisputable impartiality toward foreign states. He adhered to this rule of public conduct, against very strong inducements to depart from it, and when the popularity of the moment seemed to favor such a departure. In the next place, he maintained true dignity and unsullied honor in all communications with foreign states. It was among the high duties devolved upon him, to introduce our new government into the circle of civilized states and powerful nations. Not arrogant or assuming, with no unbecoming or supercilious bearing, he yet exacted for it from all others entire and punctilious respect. He demanded, and he obtained at once, a standing of perfect equality for his country in the society of nations; nor was there a prince or potentate of his day, whose personal character carried with it, into the intercourse of other states, a greater degree of respect and veneration.

He regarded other nations only as they stood in political relations to us. With their internal affairs, their political parties, and dissensions, he scrupulously abstained from all interference; and, on the other hand, he repelled with spirit all such interference by others with us or our concerns. His sternest rebuke, the most indignant measure of his whole administration, was aimed against such an attempted interference. He felt it as an attempt to wound the national honor, and resented it accordingly.

The reiterated admonitions in his Farewell Address show his deep fears that foreign influence would insinuate itself into our counsels through the channels of domestic dissension and obtain a sympathy with our own temporary parties. Against all such dangers he most earnestly entreats the country to guard itself. He appeals to its patriotism, to its self-respect, to its own honor, to every consideration connected with its welfare and happiness to resist, at the very beginning, all tendencies toward such connection of foreign interests with our own affairs. With a tone of earnestness nowhere else found, even in his last affectionate farewell advice to his countrymen, he says, "Against the insidious wiles of foreign influence (I conjure you to believe me, fellow citizens) the jealousy of a free people ought to be constantly awake; since history and experience prove, that foreign influence is one of the most baneful foes of republican government."

Lastly, on the subject of foreign relations, Washington never forgot that we had interests peculiar to ourselves. The primary political concerns of Europe, he saw, did not affect us. We had nothing to do with her balance of power, her family compacts, or her successions to thrones. We were placed in a condition favorable to neutrality during European wars, and to the enjoyment of all the great advantages of that relation. "Why then," he asks us, "why forego the advantages of so peculiar a situation? Why quit our own to stand upon foreign ground? Why be interweaving our destiny with that of any part of Europe, entangle our peace and prosperity in the toils of European ambition, rivalship, interest, humor, or caprice?"

Indeed, gentlemen, Washington's Farewell Address is full of truths important at all times, and particularly deserving consideration at the present. With a sagacity which brought the future before him and made it like the present, he saw and pointed out the dangers that even at this moment most imminently threaten us. I hardly know how a greater service of that kind could now be done to the community than by a renewed and wide diffusion of that admirable paper and an earnest invitation to every man in the country to reperuse and consider it. Its political maxims are invaluable; its exhortations to love of country and to brotherly affection among citizens touching; and the solemnity with which it urges the observance of moral duties and impresses the power of religious obligation gives to it the highest character of truly disinterested, sincere, parental advice.

The domestic policy of Washington found its polestar in the avowed objects of the Constitution itself. He sought so to administer that Constitution as to form a more perfect Union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty. Those were objects interesting in the highest degree to the whole country, and his policy embraced the whole country.

Among his earliest and most important duties was the organization of the Government itself, the choice of his confidential advisers, and the various appointments to office. This duty, so important and delicate when a whole Government was to be organized and all its offices for the first time filled, was yet not difficult to him, for he had no sinister ends to accomplish, no clamorous partisans to gratify, no pledges to redeem, no object to be regarded but simply the public good. It was a plain, straightforward matter, a mere honest choice of good men for the public service.

His own singleness of purpose, his disinterested patriotism were evinced by the selection of his first Cabinet, and by the manner in which he filled the seats of justice and other places of high trust. He sought for men fit for offices, not for offices which might suit men. Above personal considerations, above local considerations, above party considerations, he felt that he could only discharge the sacred trust which the country had placed in his hands by a diligent inquiry after real merit and a conscientious preference of virtue and talent. The whole country was the field of his selection. He explored that whole field, looking only for whatever it contained most worthy and distinguished. He was indeed most successful, and he deserved success for the purity of his motives, the liberality of his sentiments, and his enlarged and manly policy.

Washington's administration established the national credit, made provision for the public debt, and for that patriotic Army whose interests and welfare were always so dear to him; and, by laws wisely framed and of admirable effect, raised the commerce and navigation of the country, almost at once, from depression and ruin to a state of prosperity. Nor were his eyes open to these interests alone. He viewed with equal concern its agriculture and manufactures, and, so far as they came within the regular exercise of the powers of this Government, they experienced regard and favor.

It should not be omitted, even in this slight reference to the general measures and general principles of the first President, that he saw and felt the full value and importance of the judicial department of the Government. An upright and able administration of the laws he held to be alike indispensable to private happiness and public liberty. The temple of justice, in his opinion, was a sacred place, and he would profane and pollute it who should call any to minister in it not spotless in character, not incorruptible in integrity, not competent by talent and learning, not a fit object of unhesitating trust.

Among other admonitions, Washington has left us, in his last communication to his country, an exhortation against the excesses of party spirit. A fire not to be quenched, he yet conjures us not to fan and feed the flame. Undoubtedly, gentlemen, it is the greatest danger of our system and of our time. Undoubtedly, if that system should be overthrown, it will be the work of excessive party spirit, acting on the Government, which is dangerous enough, or acting in the Government, which is a thousand times more dangerous; for government then becomes nothing but organized party, and, in the strange vicissitudes of human affairs, it may come at last, perhaps, to exhibit the singular paradox of government itself being in opposition to its own powers, at war with the very elements of its own existence. Such cases are hopeless. As men may be protected against murder, but can not be guarded against suicide, so government may be shielded from the assaults of external foes, but nothing can save it when it chooses to lay violent hands on itself.

Finally, gentlemen, there was in the breast of Washington one sentiment so deeply felt, so constantly uppermost, that no proper occasion escaped without its utterance. From the letter which he signed in behalf of the convention when the Constitution was sent out to the people, to the moment when he put his hand to that last paper in which he addressed his countrymen, the Union—the Union was the great object of his thoughts. In that first letter he tells them that, to him and his brethren of the convention, union appears to be the greatest interest of every true American; and in that last paper he conjures them to regard that unity of government which constitutes them one people as the very palladium of their prosperity and safety, and the security of liberty itself. He regarded the union of these States less as one of our blessings, than as the great treasure house which contained them all. Here, in his judgment, was the great magazine of all our means of prosperity; here, as he thought, and as every true American still thinks, are deposited all our animating prospects, all our solid hopes for future greatness. He has taught us to maintain this union, not by seeking to enlarge the powers of the Government, on the one hand, nor by surrendering them, on the other, but by an administration of them at once firm and moderate, pursuing objects truly national, and carried on in a spirit of justice and equity.

The extreme solicitude for the preservation of the Union, at all times manifested by him, shows not only the opinion he entertained of its importance but his clear perception of those causes which were likely to spring up to endanger it, and which, if once they should overthrow the present system, would leave little hope of any future beneficial reunion. Of all the presumptions indulged by presumptuous man, that is one of the rashest which looks for repeated and favorable opportunities for the deliberate establishment of a united government over distinct and widely extended communities. Such a thing has happened once in human affairs, and but once; the event stands out as a prominent exception to all ordinary history; and unless we suppose ourselves running into an age of miracles, we may not expect its repetition.

Washington, therefore, could regard, and did regard, nothing as of paramount political interest but the integrity of the Union itself. With a united government, well administered, he saw that we had nothing to fear, and without it nothing to hope. The sentiment is just, and its momentous truth should solemnly impress the whole country. If we might regard our country as personated in the spirit of Washington, if we might consider him as representing her, in her past renown, her present prosperity, and her future career, and as in that character demanding of us all to account for our conduct as political men or as private citizens, how should he answer him who has ventured to talk of disunion and dismemberment? Or how should he answer him who dwells perpetually on local interests and fans every kindling flame of local prejudice? How should he answer him who would array State against State, interest against interest, and party against party, careless of the continuance of that unity of government which constitutes us one people?

The political prosperity which this country has attained, and which it now enjoys, has been acquired mainly through the instrumentality of the present Government. While this agent continues, the capacity of attaining to still higher degrees of prosperity exists also. We have, while this lasts, a political life capable of beneficial exertion, with power to resist or overcome misfortunes, to sustain us against the ordinary accidents of human affairs, and to promote, by active efforts, every public interest. But dismemberment strikes at the very being which preserves these faculties. It would lay its rude and ruthless hand on this great agent itself. It would sweep away not only what we possess but all power of regaining lost or acquiring new possessions. It would leave the country not only bereft of its prosperity and happiness but without limbs, or organs, or faculties by which to exert itself hereafter in the pursuit of that prosperity and happiness.

Other misfortunes may be borne or their effects overcome. If disastrous war should sweep our commerce from the ocean, another generation may renew it; if it exhaust our Treasury, future industry may replenish it; if it desolate and lay waste our fields, still under a new cultivation they will grow green again and ripen to future harvests. It were but a trifle even if the walls of yonder Capitol were to crumble, if its lofty pillars should fall and its gorgeous decorations be all covered by the dust of the valley. All these might be rebuilt. But who shall reconstruct the fabric of demolished government? Who shall rear again the well-proportioned columns of constitutional liberty? Who shall frame together the skillful architecture which unites national sovereignty with State rights, individual security, and public prosperity? No; if these columns fall, they will be raised not again. Like the coliseum and the parthenon, they will be destined to a mournful, a melancholy immortality. Bitterer tears, however, will flow over them than were ever shed over the monuments of Roman or Grecian art, for they will be the remnants of a more glorious edifice than Greece or Rome ever saw, the edifice of constitutional American liberty.

But let us hope for better things. Let us trust in that gracious Being who has hitherto held our country as in the hollow of His hand. Let us trust to the virtue and the intelligence of the people and to the efficacy of religious obligation. Let us trust to the influence of Washington's example. Let us hope that that fear of Heaven which expels all other fear and that regard to duty which transcends all other regard may influence public men and private citizens and lead our country still onward in her happy career. Full of these gratifying anticipations and hopes, let us look forward to the end of that century which is now commenced. A hundred years hence other disciples of Washington will celebrate his birth with no less of sincere admiration than we now commemorate it. When they shall meet, as we now meet, to do themselves and him that honor, so surely as they shall see the blue summits of his native mountains rise in the horizon, so surely as they shall behold the river on whose banks he lived, and on whose banks he rests, still flowing on toward the sea, so surely may they see, as we now see, the flag of the Union floating on the top of the Capitol, and then, as now, may the sun in his course visit no land more free, more happy, more lovely, than this our own country!

Gentlemen, I propose the memory of George Washington.

Mr. SMITH presented the following concurrent resolution of the Legislature of South Carolina, which was referred to the Committee on Finance:

A concurrent resolution relating to a preferential excise tax on tobacco products manufactured from tobacco purchased from the farmers of South Carolina

Whereas the Secretary of the Treasury has recommended a material increase in the excise taxes on manufactured tobacco products and hearings on these recommendations are now being conducted by the Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives; and

Whereas even the present excise taxes on tobacco products are considerably higher than the price paid for tobacco as it leaves the farm, as illustrated by the facts that the present tax on manufactured tobacco (in which form 70 per cent of the entire South Carolina tobacco crop is consumed) is 18 cents per pound, equivalent to 10.8 cents on the unmanufactured tobacco as it leaves the farm, while the average price realized by the farmers of South Carolina in the last 10 years has been 9 cents per pound; and

Whereas an increase in the excise taxes will render this disparity even greater and will very probably operate to further reduce the return to the grower, it being proposed to increase the excise tax on manufactured tobacco to 21 cents, which is equivalent to 12.6 cents on the raw material as it leaves the farm, while the price realized by the tobacco growers of this State on their 1931 crop is less than 7 cents per pound, making the proposed tax 180 per cent of the return received by the grower; and

Whereas both the Federal and State Governments are committed to the policy of aiding the farmers to the end that farmers may secure a better price for their products; and

Whereas this policy can best be given practical application as far as to the tobacco growers are concerned through a provision in the Federal excise tax laws allowing a reduction equivalent to 4 cents per pound on the unmanufactured tobacco in the tax payable on tobacco products manufactured from tobacco purchased from the farmers; and

Whereas this is a practical measure of farm relief for a large group of farmers in this country who are in a very serious situation: Therefore be it

Resolved by the house of representatives (the senate concurring), That the Legislature of South Carolina hereby respectfully memorializes the Congress of the United States not to increase the excise tax on manufactured tobacco unless this is absolutely necessary in balancing the Federal Budget, and in any event to allow a reduction equivalent to 4 cents per pound on the unmanufactured tobacco in the excise taxes payable on all tobacco products manufactured from tobacco purchased from or through the farmers of America; be it further

Resolved, That properly attested copies of this resolution be transmitted to both Houses of Congress of the United States, to the Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives, the Finance Committee of the United States Senate, the Committee on Agriculture of the House of Representatives, the Federal Farm Board, and to each of the United States Senators from South Carolina and each South Carolina Member of the House of Representatives.

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Columbia, S. C., February 17, 1932.

I hereby certify that the foregoing is a true and correct copy of a resolution adopted by the house of representatives and concurred in by the senate.

Clerk of the House.

THE PHILIPPINE QUESTION

Mr. HAWES. Mr. President, an attempt is being made to create an impression among American citizens that Mohammedan Filipinos and pagan Filipinos, who represent only about 9 per cent of the population, are opposed to independence.

This is not correct. I personally received petitions, delegations, and memorials from both pagans and Mohammedans asking for independence. It is my opinion that they would rather be ruled by Malays than by Americans.

I ask to have inserted in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs a letter from an Igorrote, a college student of the United States, and now a successful practitioner of medicine. He lives at Baguio, in the heart of the Igorrote Province. The letter is so intelligently expressed that I believe it will be a valuable contribution in answering the specialized propaganda that all Mohammedan and pagan Malays prefer American to Christian Filipino rule.

There being no objection, the letter was referred to the Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BAGUIO, P. I., July 20, 1931.

The Hon. Senator HARRY B. HAWES,
Manila, P. I.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I have no doubt you will be glad to hear from a pagan. I am one of those 500,000 non-Christians who are misrepresented by selfish interests as indifferent or against Philippine independence. I am doubly glad to see a United States Senator intensely interested to find out the truth on our demand for immediate independence. I was among the crowd who gave you a rousing welcome at the city hall, Baguio, a few days ago. You spoke to us of the minority pagans and Moros, numbering about 500,000, as compared with the 13,000,000 Christian Filipinos who are undoubtedly solid for immediate freedom. But the American people should not be misled by selfish propaganda of some Americans that these 500,000 Moros and pagans are all against the freedom of their country. Nothing is so far from the truth than such representation by imperialists. There are many thousands of these pagans like myself who are just as zealous for freedom as any of their brother Christian Filipinos. Their desire for freedom is pure, instinctive, and unpolluted. Way back in 1907, when I was just a boy of 15 years and attending the public schools, my desire for freedom was just as strong as it is to-day, in spite of the fact that all of my teachers were Americans, all against independence, and preaching that to be under the American flag is a blessing for the Filipinos.

My parents, relatives, and family are all pure Igorotes, numbering about 100, and among those called head-hunters. They are not highly educated, but they are all strong for independence, and nothing will satisfy them short of independence.

I went to your country way back in 1913 and stayed there six solid years at my own expense and worked to get my education. During that time I obtained two degrees, one in science and another in medicine. I obtained these degrees from your famous great university, the University of Chicago, and from your famous college of medicine, the Rush Medical College, in Chicago, respectively. There are many others who are as highly educated as myself, and you can see from their records that the pagans and Moros are not as far behind as they are painted to the American public by selfish interests.

True enough, there are a few of these 500,000 Moros and pagans who are very ignorant and primitive and indifferent to what broad independence means, but still in their own communities and towns they love to be left alone, free and undisturbed by foreign civilization and government. They want to govern themselves and be let alone without interference from outside. Furthermore, Mr. Senator, can we point out any country to-day which is 100 per cent perfect, without a single ignorant citizen? If the United States were still under England, could we not find American ignorant citizens indifferent to freedom? My point is this: That in any country in the world to-day we will find a good many ignorant citizens, who are in the minority. This minority is well taken care of by the majority, who runs the government. In the same way, there is no reason why an independent Filipino government can not take care of the 500,000 Moros and pagans who are misrepresented in the States as against freedom and as neglected. There is no doubt in my mind that a Filipino government will give more attention and a better government to her own people than a foreign government. That Filipino government may be poor and accompanied by bad times in the beginning, but in the final the people will be very happy. That is very natural to me and, I think, is a safe conclusion.

Ever since the beginning of American administration in the Philippines the so-called non-Christians have always been controlled and administered directly by American officials, who, as you know, preach retention to the Moros and pagans. In spite of that there are thousands of them with their Christian brothers in our demand for immediate independence.

In conclusion I must say here that I admire your country and your good Government, and we non-Christians are very thankful for what your country has done for us in particular, and for the Filipino people in general, and for all these the Filipinos no doubt are grateful. We will always regard the United States of America as our father and benefactor. But it is very natural and an instinct for any people with self-respect and national pride to ask for their own government, for which they are ready. We Filipinos are ready and united to embark in complete self-government. We have faith in the American people that the promise of Philippine independence embodied in the Jones law will be fulfilled, the sooner the better. We may find difficulties and hard times in the beginning, but we know they are the price of liberty and we know that we will finally be happy with our own country and government.

I will be glad to answer any questions not clear to you about the 500,000 Moros and pagans, who, as you know, are made much an argument against Philippine independence by enemies of Philippine freedom.

Yours very truly,

Dr. J. M. CARIÑO.

BIMETALLIC SYSTEM OF CURRENCY—GOVERNOR MURRAY'S VIEWS

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I ask permission to have inserted in the RECORD, and appropriately referred, a letter written by Governor Murray, of Oklahoma, indorsing my bill (S. 2487) providing for the establishment of a bimetallic system of currency. I ask that the letter may be referred to the Committee on Finance and printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATE OF OKLAHOMA, EXECUTIVE CHAMBER,
Oklahoma City, February 11, 1932.

Hon. BURTON K. WHEELER,
United States Senator, Senate Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I have your letter of February 2, with inclosures. Your speech in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and Senate bill No. 2487, by WHEELER, "A bill to establish a bimetallic system of currency," etc., and requesting my comment upon the said bill. In reply, I find no need of material change in the bill, and should like to see it become a law.

Complying with your request, notwithstanding I am completely engrossed in the affairs of the State just now, I shall nevertheless undertake to discuss the question of bimetallism and currency, without duplicating your rather complete discussion of the question in the speech you sent me.

"Money" is defined as the "medium of exchange"—the exchange of values. It should represent something of value that becomes at once the exchange value between it and other values. By the same token all bank notes or bills of credit, which may be termed currency, should likewise represent value; but, since 1875, such notes have represented debt. In the case of the banking law, repealed by the regional reserve system, they were based on public debt; under the regional reserve on private debt limited to commercial paper, and therefore does not represent value at all.

Now, there can be no dispute about both gold and silver representing values—both are precious metals of great demand in all the world in different industries, even without reference to value as money. Since under a sound, safe system of currency, or bills of credit, or bank notes, or by whatever name you wish to call it, they should represent a limited proportion of the value of some product, plus a reserve of actual money, and since there is not a sufficient amount of gold in the world to do this, without a diminution of the amount of money in circulation, it would seem essential that silver should be added, as was intended by the Constitution of the United States.

According to my thinking, the Government should coin a sufficient amount of money, gold and silver, to take care of the normal business of the country, and, in addition, a sufficient per cent to become the basis for "token" money through bank currency or notes. The world will suffer until that is done, and it seems that England realizes it, but we do not. This position is the position of all who believe in sound currency and a sufficient circulating medium.

I will admit, however, that at this time additional coinage of money is not so important as breaking the chains that bind credits, for whatever be the amount of money coined, if it be controlled by one group it would be immaterial whether there were much or little, the effect upon commerce and production in particular would be the same; however, my viewpoint, both the breaking of the chains that bind credit and the increase of "coinage" should go hand in hand and together as necessary to the rehabilitation of the producers of the country. At this time, also, there is a greater demand for "coinage" of silver or bimetallism than when it was the great issue in 1896, for if England adopts bimetallism or accepts silver to a large extent, beyond doubt the other countries of Europe, except perhaps France, will follow, as will Latin America, and then England would get the lion's share of trade, and America, as you have pointed out in your speech, would suffer in the markets of the world.

Sooner or later, whether we will or not, we shall be obliged to adopt bimetallism, or to coin much more silver than we are now doing, or lose that foreign trade so necessary just now to keep American labor employed. It is unnecessary for me to say to you that when labor is employed labor is satisfied, but when not employed they, like other people, may arrive at erroneous conclusions and seek vain and foolish things in the hope of finding a cure for the economic difficulties to the future safety of society and government as we now know it.

For lack of time, I beg you to pardon this communication, and to accept my sincere wishes that you may succeed in passing your bill, although I fear the forces who stand opposed will defeat you.

With salutations and best regards, believe me,

Ever yours sincerely,

WM. H. MURRAY, Governor.

PROPOSED TARIFF ON OIL

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas presented a petition relative to a proposed tariff on oil, which was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed in the RECORD without the signatures after the first one, as follows:

A fair portion of the selling price of every barrel of oil that is produced in the United States by American oil producers is paid out by us in the form of county taxes, State production taxes, and Federal income taxes. Every piece of machinery we use and every truck we use in producing American oil is taxed—even the pipe lines and railroads that we use for transporting oil. We very gladly pay this tax in order to do our share toward supporting our Government—and we are mighty thankful for the privilege.

Foreign oils that are being shipped in from South America do not pay any of these taxes. American oil producers should not be penalized just because of the fact that we are Americans, employing American capital and American labor.

In all fairness, as long as foreign oil is not taxed, American producers should have an even chance, which would mean that to be fair we would be exempt from all county taxes, State production taxes, and Federal income taxes.

That, of course, is quite impossible, because our Government must function, and in order to do so it must have the necessary money to pay the costs, which means taxes.

We, the undersigned, favor the tariff on foreign oil and oil products.

H. E. McDONALD

GUARANTY FOR BANK DEPOSITS

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas also presented a letter from West Hughes, relating to a national bank deposit guaranty, which was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LOS ANGELES, CALIF., February 5, 1932.

Hon. JOE T. ROBINSON,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: In your favor of January 22, replying to my letter of the 11th advocating a guaranty for bank deposits, you state that you were once very favorably disposed to such a guaranty. It is rather odd that with me the case is reversed, for once I opposed such legislation, considering it Populistic and too much governmental interference with business.

By this morning's paper I see Hoover is urging people to stop hoarding, making the statement that $1 brought out of hoarding will put 5 to 10 in circulation. Of course, the Reconstruction Finance Corporation will help; but it will not put an end to hoarding, and urging people to stop the practice will avail little; it may even have the opposite effect.

When you see banks all around you failing you can not blame people for withdrawing their money and putting it in a safe-deposit box. The only thing that will stop hoarding is some legislation that will make people feel sure that when they deposit money in a bank it can not possibly be lost.

Insurance companies will insure against loss from bank failures, and during the past two years they have lost quite a lot from that insurance. Now, I am not advocating the Government going into the insurance business, though I firmly believe that if there had been governmental insurance of bank deposits during the past two years the Government would now be the gainer. In the first place, there would not have been so many bank failures, for no bank would have failed on account of frightened depositors withdrawing their funds. In the second place, on account of improved business conditions, Government receipts would have been much larger. Of course, the Government should not stand the expense. It should be borne by the depositors or by the banks, or by both.

A guaranty fund, once established, would require very little subsequent additions, for in the great majority of cases the entire amount paid depositors would ultimately be returned to the fund.

The manner of establishing this guaranty fund is immaterial. Personally I think a small tax should be levied against the total bank deposits.

Objection urged against this is that it would not be right for a conservatively managed bank to be taxed to pay the losses of banks not properly conducted. There is something to that objection; but, in the long run, the conservative banks would gain a great deal more than the amount of the tax. On account of the confidence of the public, absence of hoarding, and business stability, the business of the banks would be much more profitable.

The claim is also made that if depositors were guaranteed against loss, bank managers would be much more careless and the banks would lose largely through speculative undertakings. That certainly could be prevented by proper legislation and by frequent and thorough examinations.

With a proper guaranty fund handled by the Federal reserve, after any bank failure from any cause whatsoever, all depositors could be paid in full within 30 days. Now this would certainly remove fear, restore confidence, and stop hoarding.

It would also be of great benefit in that it would force all banks to be nationalized and thus unify our banking system.

Of course any legislation of this character must have the indorsement of Senator GLASS. There is a man for whom I have the greatest admiration. You will no doubt discuss financial legislation with him. Please give him my kindest regards. Tell him that I am not a Populist, not a wild advocate of Government ownership, but an individualist. I feel somewhat closer to all Virginians, from the fact that I received the degree of M. A. from the University of Virginia.

I was once very much opposed to any kind of a guaranty on bank deposits, but under present conditions I believe it is absolutely the only remedy that will stop hoarding, and that any drawbacks to such legislation would be very much outweighed by the benefits it would confer.

The Federal reserve act was largely the work of Senator GLASS and it is the most constructive piece of financial legislation ever adopted by Congress. Of equal importance would be some sort of legislation which would call from hiding more than a billion dollars now removed from circulation. In my opinion, nothing can do this short of an absolute guaranty that when a man puts his money in a national bank he can not possibly lose it.

If I am intruding too much on your time, please forgive me.

Yours very truly,

WEST HUGHES.

PETITION OF CITIZENS OF CALHOUN COUNTY, FLA.

Mr. FLETCHER presented a petition of a committee of citizens of Calhoun County, Fla., which, with the accompanying editorial, was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD without the signatures after the first one, as follows:

Hon. DUNCAN U. FLETCHER,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: We, a committee of citizens of Calhoun County, Fla., composed of farmers, business men, and laborers, petition your honor that you read the editorial inclosed hereto, as this speaks our full sentiment.

We need relief; we must have it, as we have come to the forks of the road.

E. L. BRANCH, Chairman.

THE WORLD'S NEWS—A MONTHLY REVIEW—WILL CONGRESS STABILIZE POVERTY OR STABILIZE PROSPERITY?

By Clarence Poe, president the Progressive Farmer-Ruralist Co.

We have come to the forks of the road in America. The Seventy-second Congress will decide which way we are to go.

We shall stabilize poverty.

Or else we shall stabilize prosperity.

It is for Congress to decide.

As a writer in the Atlantic Monthly puts it:

"The more economic theory I read, the more confused I get. Why are so many millions in want? Because we have produced so much. Why must they wear shabby clothes? Because we have too much cotton, too much wool, too many mills, and too many mill hands who want to make cloth. Why must millions live in slums—foul breeding places of disease and crime? Because we have too much lumber, too much steel, too many carpenters, too many plumbers. Why can't we transport surplus products to the places where they are needed? Because we have too many freight cars, too many railroad workers, too many trucks, too many—

"But this doesn't make sense * * *. There are only two cures for general overproduction, one is to reduce production and stabilize poverty; the other is to increase consumption and stabilize prosperity."

That is the issue before Congress—to decide whether we shall throw away a whole century's proud gains of science and invention and discovery and education, scrap half our factories and mills, scrap half our freight cars and trucks and engines, throw half our workers into unemployment—all because society hasn't enough intelligence to utilize the wealth-producing factors already discovered, already set up, all ready to work. It is an amazing situation—an amazing suggestion.

STABILIZING POVERTY OR PROSPERITY

About the most absurd figure in America to-day is some alleged statistician presenting charts of the deflation that followed the Napoleonic wars—in days before a locomotive was ever invented, a telegraph ever dreamed of, hydroelectric power even conceived, a modern factory ever built, or a modern technician ever trained—and arguing that because a long period of near starvation followed Napoleon's wars, we must suffer similar privation now in post-World War days, when science has remade the world, studded the continent with factories, harnessed the rivers, bound all sections together with railroad and telegraph, automobile and airplane, and given the keys of science and education to high and low alike. On this point read Dr. Glenn Frank in our "Thought for To-day."

Unquestionably Doctor Frank has correctly defined the issue that confronts those who sit in the seats of the mighty at Washington. They may grasp a historic opportunity and say with Rupert Brooke—

"Now God be thanked who has matched us with this hour!"

Or they may turn back the hands on the clock of human progress and take "the coward's policy of social retreat" which may engulf the whole world in Bolshevism—or worse. As President Daniel Willard, of the Baltimore & Ohio Railway, said March 27:

"A system—call it what you will—under which it is possible for five or six millions of willing and able-bodied men to be out of work and unable to secure work for months at a time, and with no other source of income, can not be said to be perfect or even satisfactory. * * * A second problem is bound up closely with the first: The United States is perhaps the richest country in the world in natural and humanistic resources. * * * We have a productive capacity in our mills and factories far beyond our own domestic requirements. At the same time, with all this surplus of wealth and resources, we have millions, so it is said, in dire need of food and clothing. In short, more of everything to eat and wear than we can possibly use—and millions of human beings hungry and cold! These two problems together—unemployment and the distribution of resources—bring into question the very foundations of our political and economic system."

THE ACID TEST FOR EVERY CANDIDATE

That a man should be thrifty, should save something, should never live beyond his income—this is, of course, obvious. But the suggested lowering of general living standards, the proposal for an "international starvation race," the suggestion that with the factories and inventions of 1932 we must live as men lived in 1832 or 1732, such proposals are both unthinkable and unjustifiable. As long ago as 1889 Dr. Richard T. Ely presented the claim that "in the civilized nations of the earth the recent inventions and discoveries—especially the application of steam to industry—can do twelve times as much physical work as all the men living in these nations * * * as if 12 slaves were working for every man, or 60 for every family." Would it be too much to say that in the 40 years since Doctor Ely wrote this the potential wealth-producing power of the world's mills and factories and farms has again been doubled; that it is as if 120 slaves were waiting to serve every family if our productive potentialities were only utilized?

Men laugh bitterly to-day at those predeflation economists who proclaimed a "new economic era" of plenty, but they were right so far as economic possibilities were concerned. What we have not developed is a new era in statesmanship to make these new economic possibilities a reality. We can create wealth in plenty. It only remains for society, through government, to provide for an equitable distribution which will provide customers for a busy industry. And the people of America in 1932 should support no political party and no candidate for President of the Nation or governor of any State, for Senator or Representative in Congress, or for senator or representative in any State legislature unless the man or party does two things:

1. Unless he or it admits that there is at present a grossly unfair distribution of wealth in America; and

2. Unless he or it proposes an intelligent program for remedying this fundamentally unfair situation.

At one point we can begin now—must begin now if America is not to be plunged into profounder depths of poverty and danger. When a debt is contracted and the dollars loaned represent 10 bales of cotton or 100 bushels of wheat, and the governments and financial systems of the earth make it so that the creditor collects dollars that represent 30 bales of cotton or 3,000 bushels of wheat (and in similar proportions as regards all other commodities)—when this happens the debtor is bound to feel that a crime has been committed against him. He has been robbed not only in the name of the law but with the help of law, which is supposed to protect him from robbery. His respect for government is shocked. And at the same time prosperity is checked.

Nothing Congress can do to promote prosperity is more important than stabilizing the value of the dollar at average levels of the decade 1920–1930, so that the farmers of America (and all other citizens) can pay their debts with money of the same value as that prevailing when the debts were created. It is not merely the burden of debt but the excess and extra burden of debt which has been added through the unjust increase in the value of money—it is this which is making any economic recovery impossible. If the people could only pay debts on the basis of commodity values prevailing when the debts were made, they would not only pull through but the mere prospect of this result would give a new confidence that would itself go far toward restoring prosperity. The American Farm Bureau, the Grange, and the National Farmers' Union are all united in this demand for stabilizing the value of the dollar on the 1926 level, which is practically the average level of 1920–1930. There are several ways whereby this may be accomplished. As Samuel Crowther wrote in the Saturday Evening Post of December 5:

"Prices can be kept at a reasonably steady level—a level of sound prosperity. The Macmillan commission, made up of the foremost British financial experts, agrees that this can be done. The foremost economists likewise agree. More than that, it was actually done in 1921 and ended that depression. * * * The Federal reserve banks have the inherent power to control the price level. They have hesitated to assume the great responsibility."

It would seem obvious that Congress should at once compel the Federal reserve system to abandon its hesitation and assume a task it was created to perform. International action to deal with the silver problem also seems a necessity. And in the long run, as Dr. Irving Fisher so ably advocates, the value of the dollar itself must be based on the standard purchasing power of a dollar throughout the decade 1920–1930, or on some other basis which will prevent "the changes in the level of prices which is the main secret of social trouble," as the Macmillan commission itself declared.

THE POSTAL SAVINGS SYSTEM

Mr. DILL introduced a bill (S. 3768) to amend the act approved June 25, 1910, authorizing the Postal Savings System, and for other purposes, which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

An act (S. 3768) to amend the act approved June 25, 1910, authorizing the Postal Savings System, and for other purposes

Be it enacted, etc., That that part of the act approved June 25, 1910, authorizing a system of postal savings depositories as is hereby affected, shall be amended by adding the following new sections:

"SECTION 1. That for a period of three years after the passage of this act all postal savings banks, in addition to deposits provided for by the act of June 25, 1910, shall carry also a deposit and checking-fund account not to exceed $5,000, and any person authorized to make deposits in postal savings banks shall be authorized to make deposits in the deposit and checking-fund account. The Postmaster General shall supply all necessary forms of blank checks, deposit slips, and other business forms for use of depositors, and shall furnish monthly statements of accounts to depositors.

"SEC. 2. The Postmaster General shall appoint such additional clerks as may be necessary to handle said deposit and checking accounts under bonds, the amount of said bonds to be fixed by the Postmaster General for each particular postal savings bank where said deposit and checking-fund accounts are kept.

"SEC. 3. Any depositor with a deposit and checking account shall be entitled to draw funds on demand, but the Postmaster General is hereby authorized to declare an emergency for any postal savings bank at any time he may decide, and during the period of said emergency the depositor may be required by the cashier of said postal savings bank to give 10 days' notice for payment of any part of his existing deposit in excess of 50 per cent of the same.

"SEC. 4. The Postmaster General shall invest the funds of the deposit and checking division of the postal savings bank in direct Government obligations of the United States as he may decide is most advantageous to the system, and shall keep on hand a cash reserve of at least 20 per cent of the total deposits of any postal savings bank.

"SEC. 5. The Postmaster General is authorized to create a special deposit and checking fund and keep such parts of said fund as he may deem advisable on deposit in each of the Federal reserve banks located in the respective Federal reserve districts. Said district deposits shall be credited to the postal deposit and checking fund by said Federal reserve banks and the Postmaster General shall credit each postal savings bank with the amount of deposits in said fund to which each bank is entitled.

"The Postmaster General is hereby authorized to make application to any local agent of the Federal Reserve Board for such amount of Federal reserve notes as he may require to maintain in said fund necessary cash reserves or funds to meet withdrawal demands from the deposit and checking account of any postal savings bank. Such application shall be accompanied by the tender of direct obligations of the United States as collateral in amount equal to the sum of the Federal reserve notes thus applied for.

"The Federal Reserve Board is hereby authorized to issue Federal reserve notes to the Postmaster General based on direct obligations of the United States as collateral on the same terms as provided for local member banks of the Federal Reserve Board."

CERTIFICATES OF CONVENIENCE AND NECESSITY FOR AIRCRAFT CARRIERS

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, I ask permission to have inserted in the RECORD an article written by Howard C. Knotts, aviation supervisor for the Illinois Commerce Commission, entitled "Certificates of Convenience and Necessity for Aircraft Carriers," which was published in the January issue of the Journal of Air Law.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CERTIFICATES OF CONVENIENCE AND NECESSITY FOR AIRCRAFT CARRIERS[1]

By Howard C. Knotts, aviation supervisor Illinois Commerce Commission

The regulation by State public-utilities commissions of aircraft engaged in the business of transporting persons and property is yet so novel that any deductions I may draw must necessarily be broad, and the facts must be largely taken from my own experience in Illinois. Indeed, it may be that many of you have never heard of certificates of convenience and necessity for aircraft carriers. They are no different from such certificates for other common carriers; that is, they are grants to operate between two or more points and must be supported by adequate service, operating ability, and financial responsibility. They are not monopolistic, but in Illinois the old carrier in the field, if responsible, is given first chance to supply any new or increased service required by public convenience and necessity.

In the whole United States but nine States have issued certificates of convenience and necessity to aircraft carriers. These are but 69 in number, and two-thirds of them have been issued in one State, namely, Pennsylvania. The others—Arizona, Colorado, Illinois, Maryland, Nevada, New Mexico, North Dakota, and Wyoming—have issued the remainder. Few of such applications have been refused, and Arizona occupies the unique position of having refused more than she has granted. North Dakota issued one without a hearing. At least one certificate has been granted (by Colorado) where there were no intrastate terminals, and the operation appears to have been entirely interstate. The application was voluntarily made by the aircraft carrier, and the Colorado Public Utilities Commission took the position that it was compelled to grant the certificate. No reason is assigned why it did not simply refuse to take jurisdiction and dismiss the application. (P. U. R. 1928E, 518.)

For part of the foregoing compilation I am greatly indebted to the Air Law Institute of Northwestern University, which has sent a searching questionnaire on this subject to each of the State public-utilities commissions. All of us can look forward with interest to the result of this comprehensive investigation, which is now scheduled to appear in the April, 1932, issue of the Journal of Air Law.

The amazing thing is that not more than a dozen orders concerning aircraft-carrier regulation have found their way into print. This includes not only the published Public Utility Reports but also such special aeronautical-law services as are furnished by United States Aviation Reports and the Aviation Law Service of the Commerce Clearing House. It is little wonder that each commission is groping around for the benefit of the other fellow's experience. Those of us who are engaged in this work are in no small measure to blame for this situation.

Even the articles in legal publications are not many on the subject under discussion. Furthermore they are in most instances too meager to be very helpful. However, I can refer you to three I have found useful: The prophetic one in the January, 1930, issue of the Journal of Air Law entitled "The Certificate of Convenience and Necessity Applied to Air Transportation," "Aircraft as Common Carriers," in the April, 1930, issue of the same publication, and Part II of State Regulation of Aircraft in the January, 1930, issue of the Air Law Review.

The lack of activity in this branch of regulatory law appears to be due to three things: First and foremost, the lack of proper State legislation to give jurisdiction; secondly, the desire of commissions to proceed with proper caution in this new form of regulation; and, third, the mass of operation problems taking the time and efforts of air-transportation companies to the exclusion of other things, or else the reluctance of such companies to be involved in regulation before they are compelled to act.

Failure to have jurisdiction due to the lack of a proper law can only be remedied by the legislative branch in each State. Where such a condition exists the legislature should use great care in amending its public utility act, but each legislature should so act at its next session if air commerce is developing in that particular State or shows any possibility of so doing.

That each commission now having authority to take jurisdiction should proceed with caution is commendable, but in some instances the complete assurance of being absolutely right before acting in the field of air commerce will have to be sacrificed to insure the public safety and good transportation facilities in this pioneering project. It is also the duty of each commission not only to protect the public but also to protect the property and investments of regular aircraft carriers from unfair and destructive competition by irregular operators. In the motor-carrier field this has been held to be a duty imposed by law, and no doubt the same holding will prevail for the aircraft carrier.

Air-transportation companies have had many problems to solve, first as to operation, and second as to finances, especially with the falling off in aeronautical investments. However, such companies have for the most part appeared not to give adequate attention to the legal side of their problems and some have had legal advice that has steered them away from being common carriers as long as possible. This latter attitude has been carried so far that some of these companies have made themselves ridiculous in the numerous provisions recited in their long and formidable looking tickets and also in their advertising in which they have insisted upon the fiction that they are private carriers, and at the same time have held themselves forth in every other way so as to be in law common carriers. This, of course, can not last much longer, because these companies either will obtain different legal advice or else have the knowledge jammed down their throats by unfavorable court decisions resulting in the payment of large sums of money for damages to persons and property where the courts have swept aside the verbose ticket provisions as against public policy and have held these air-transportation companies to the responsibility of common carriers. Such a decision might have a serious effect upon the insurance carried by the aircraft company.

If an air-transportation company is in fact a common carrier it should be willing to accept such responsibility; and in so doing it will obtain the advantages of such a legal status if a certificate of convenience and necessity is obtained. And it is no small advantage to have a well-established business protected from the inroads of competition by irregular operators, to say nothing of the increased marketability of the stock of a corporation so protected.

The last General Assembly in Illinois passed an act creating the Illinois Aeronautics Commission, delegating to it the duties of seeing that all aircraft and all airmen have appropriate Federal licenses, that air beacons, air schools, airports, and air-navigation facilities have State licenses, and the promulgation of rules and regulations. This supervision of aeronautics is specifically said "not to be in conflict with the authority of the Illinois Commerce Commission to supervise and regulate public utilities." In other words, the regulation of aircraft common carriers was left in the hands of the body that regulates all other public utilities, and such provision was necessary in order to avoid any controversy about the constitutionality of each act. Also, it is obvious that in order to properly protect aircraft carriers and their termini the utilities body must do all the regulating in order to protect the safety of airports from high-tension lines, telephone wires, and the obstructions of other utilities already under the control of the utility commissions.

The Illinois Commerce Commission law, originally passed in 1913 and amended in 1921, contains no specific mention of aircraft or the transportation of persons and property via the air, but the following are excerpts from sections 8 and 10 of this act:

"8. The commission shall have general supervision of all public utilities, * * * shall inquire into the management of the business thereof, and shall keep itself informed as to the manner and method in which the business is conducted. It shall examine such public utilities and keep informed as to their general condition, their franchises, capitalization, rates, and other charges, and the manner in which their plants, equipment, and other property owned, leased, controlled, or operated are managed, conducted, and operated, not only with respect to the adequacy, security, and accommodation afforded by their service but also with respect to their compliance with the provisions of this act and any other law, with the orders of the commission and with the charter and franchise requirements."

"10. The term 'public utility,' when used in this act, means and includes every corporation, company, association, joint-stock company or association, firm, partnership or individual, their lessees, trustees, or receivers appointed by any court whatsoever * * * that now or hereafter:

"(a) May own, control, operate, or manage, within the State, directly or indirectly, for public use, any plant, equipment, or property used or to be used for or in connection with the transportation of persons or property * * *.

"(b) May own or control any franchise, license, permit, or right to engage in any such business.

"The term 'common carrier,' when used in this act, includes * * * every corporation, company, association, joint-stock company or association, firm, partnership, or individual, their lessees, trustees, or receivers appointed by any court whatsoever, owning, operating, or managing any such agency for public use, in the transportation of persons or property within the State."

It was and is the view of the Illinois Commerce Commission that the foregoing provisions gave jurisdiction over aircraft carriers. There is good authority for this in Illinois and elsewhere where other utilities not named in the act have been concerned. So far the carriers themselves have taken the same view. In addition, the Illinois act is very similar and sometimes identical with that of a number of other States. As the air-commerce business in Illinois began to expand beyond mere carriage of the mails and took on intrastate features the Illinois Commerce Commission began to study the problem. Seeking to use the deliberateness necessary in a new field and seeking to inform itself fully, it participated in most of the legal conferences concerning aircraft regulation and, in addition, it studied the methods of operation of companies flying in Illinois and in other States. Shortly after the first of this year it decided to take jurisdiction of these carriers under its act, and by a coincidence a new company about to start business in Illinois applied at that time for a certificate of convenience and necessity.

The situation was unusual, because the new company, Century Air Lines (Inc.), proposed to operate an entirely intrastate air line on a large business basis between Chicago and East St. Louis, two cities on the opposite borders of Illinois. Prior to this time it was rather loosely said that the only purely intrastate lines existed in California; and, of course, Century maintains its Illinois operation as part of an interstate system running from Chicago to terminals at Detroit, Cleveland, and Toledo. In any event Century proposed to start a new operation entirely within the borders of Illinois. It frankly said it wanted to be a common carrier, and offered a ticket about the size of the ordinary railroad ticket and with as little printed matter thereon; and it applied for a certificate of convenience and necessity to operate between the cities of Chicago and East St. Louis, heretofore mentioned, with stops at the intervening cities of Springfield, Bloomington, and Peoria.

This territory was at the time being served by a number of railroads and bus lines and by the Universal Division of what is now American Airways (Inc.). This existing air service carried the mail between Chicago, Ill., and St. Louis, Mo., and offered such intermediate passenger and express service at Springfield and Peoria as the two daily mail runs afforded. However, before any hearing was held Peoria dropped out of the picture due to lack of adequate airport facilities.

In a few weeks after Century Air Lines (Inc.) had filed its application, American Airways (Inc.) filed an application for a certificate of convenience and necessity to operate between Chicago, Peoria, Springfield, and to cross the Illinois-Missouri State line at a point just north of St. Louis, Mo. Upon the motion of the two air-transportation companies, the two cases were heard together, and each company stipulated that they would agree, in so far as such was permissible, that certificates should issue to each of them in accordance with their respective applications. At the hearings three railroads appeared, two having filed written protests, but as the cases progressed the railroads dropped out, one at a time, and finally all had formally withdrawn.

It is doubtful if the last railroad would have ceased to object, but it was sold before the cases were concluded, the new owner took immediate possession, and then formally withdrew the protest of its predecessor. This is most interesting, because the companies involved included two of our most important air-transportation corporations and four of our largest and best railroad systems. The receiver and former president of the last railroad to withdraw, a man with 50 years' railroad experience, testified in substance that there was no public convenience and necessity to be served, that his railroad had an investigation of 10 years' standing of the air-transportation business, and that the time was not yet ripe for it; but, on the other hand, he said freely that his investigation showed him that the air-commerce business was here to stay. Then he concluded with this significant thing, namely, that if a certificate was to be granted his road wanted the opportunity to establish the service and obtain the certificate for itself. It was rather contradictory, but the very earnest expression of a railroad man old in experience and trying to save what had once been one of the country's first and finest railroad lines.

On August 26, 1931, certificates of convenience and necessity were granted to Century Air Lines (Inc.) and American Airways (Inc.), respectively, and the public has, ever since the hearings were well under way, enjoyed the best of air service in Illinois. The only common-terminal points of these two lines are Chicago and Springfield. On June 25, 1931, National Air Transport (Inc.) filed its application for a certificate of convenience and necessity to operate an air line between Chicago and Moline, Ill., again involving an intrastate business between two cities on the opposite borders of Illinois. The applicant was and is furnishing the only common-carrier air service between the points mentioned, and at the hearings only one railroad appeared from among the number of other carriers serving the same territory. There were no objections to the application, and the certificate was granted on October 7, 1931. Now approximately 5,000 miles are flown daily on 650 miles of airways by aircraft common carriers in Illinois with an average passenger load of 2,500 persons per month. The pilots are competent and old in experience, and the equipment used includes a variety of the safest and most luxurious known. The Illinois lines connect by air or by air-rail or air-bus with 47 States and with Canada and Mexico. The business of each carrier has shown a gradual increase, and each carrier, I believe, is pleased that it has come under public-utility regulation.

The position of the Illinois Commerce Commission is that air transportation is an art which renders an entirely different class of service from that rendered by other common carriers, and this was one of the bases upon which each of the three certificates heretofore mentioned was granted. Its position also is that the art will develop better under understanding and sympathetic regulation, and, too, the convenience and the safety of the public must be served by some regulation. It is the law in Illinois, as heretofore said, that certificates of convenience and necessity are not grants of monopoly, although the oldest operator in the field is given first chance to establish the new and additional service provided it can show the proper operating ability and adequate financial responsibility. And so certificates were granted to Century Airways (Inc.) and American Airways (Inc.) using routes partially the same, not only because the respective applicants agreed to this but also because the competition appeared to be healthy rather than ruinous.

Each of these various phases, sometimes one and sometimes another, other commissions have recited in their respective orders from time to time. In Colorado (P. U. R. 1930E, 308) to Pikes Peak Aircraft (Inc.) a certificate was granted and one denied to United States Airways (Inc.) between the same terminals, because the former company chose the safer route even though a bit slower. However, this very significant paragraph appears in the order:

"It is regrettable that at this early stage of development of airplane service in our State a certificate may not be issued to each of the applicants herein. But they both agreed at the hearing that there is not enough business between Grand Junction and Denver to warrant the operation of two lines between those cities."

The Nevada Public Service Commission (P. U. R. 1928D, 854) granted certificates to three applicant companies between the same points in that State, and at the same time protected a certificate previously granted to a fourth company, Boeing Air Transport (Inc.), by establishing "home ports" for all four and announcing the following priority rule with reference to each:

"Any operator shall have a priority or preference of two hours at his 'home port' over any operator away from his 'home port.' This means no certificate holder in this State may proceed with passengers or property from any point other than his 'home port' and which is the 'home port' of another certificate holder until after a period of two hours has elapsed from the time the request for transportation is received unless he shall in the meantime secure from the operator or operators at whose 'home port' he is located a waiver of the provisions of this rule."

There has been some question as to the soundness of this arrangement, but it certainly can not be denied that it was an artful way of developing as much air transportation as possible. Furthermore, the companies involved agreed to the order.

Nevada, in a case not strictly involving aircraft, has also asserted in strong language the theory that "airplane transportation is an entirely different class of service in point of time and convenience" (Re Pickwick Stages P. U. R. 1930A, 404 at 406). And in the same case at page 405 there is found the following language:

"The controversy has seemed to revolve around the possible injury to the railroads on the one hand or the possible benefit to the stage lines on the other, neither of which is our chief concern. We do not consider what will injure the railroads or benefit the stage lines, but rather what will be the ultimate maximum benefit to our State."

In Pennsylvania, where the greatest experience in these matters has been had, a certificate was denied to Battlefields Airways (Inc.) (P. U. R. 1929A, 476), where the application was strongly contested by Gettysburg Flying Service (Inc.), which already had a certificate to serve the same territory (P. U. R. 1928B, 287), because the Pennsylvania commission felt that the granting of the second certificate would be "the creation of unnecessary and destructive competition," which "could not and would not be a contributing factor in the development of commercial flying service in Pennsylvania. * * * Common-carrier transportation by aircraft must be developed for some time at least by and through private enterprise, which should not be required to struggle for an existence in the competitive field under conditions as existing in this case." However, it must be noted that the Pennsylvania commission rather backed up on itself in the last paragraph of its order, which reads as follows:

"If, however, in any similar proceeding it appears that the application of the noncompetitive principle is not in the interest of and would not foster and encourage aviation the principle will not control. This commission desires in every way possible under its regulatory powers and duties to encourage the growth and development of commercial air service."

California, while it has not yet taken jurisdiction in this field, granted in the face of great opposition a certificate of convenience and necessity to a motor carrier to operate a passenger stage between a city and a certain airport because "such service was a necessary incident to the development of air transportation, which should be especially encouraged." (P. U. R. 1931A, 398.) Aircraft common carriers should embrace the opportunity of obtaining the advantages of regulation when such an attitude prevails.

Michigan in re Kohler Aviation Corporation (P. U. R. 1930B, 242) apparently without opposition and certainly without much discussion of the subject took jurisdiction over a securities issue of the Kohler Corporation because it was an aircraft common carrier. Otherwise the secretary of state's office would have handled the qualification of the issue. The Michigan Public Utilities Commission has also done this in at least two other cases.

Nebraska and New Hampshire have likewise partially entered the field by adopting rules and regulations covering the licensing and operation of commercial aircraft. Possibly other States have, too, but lack of available data has not permitted me to find out about them.

All commissions have been extremely cautious in the matter of rates for aircraft common carriers. In fact, the rate schedules filed by the companies have been generally accepted by the commissions upon the theory that the business is not yet old enough to permit any intelligent conclusions about a rate base. As to time and service schedules some action has been taken, but with such consideration that no operating company has had cause to complain.

What other States have done about inspection I do not know, but in Illinois we have so far felt that our inspections were as necessary to teach ourselves as to protect the public. The Illinois Commerce Commission has not cited any aircraft carrier for any failure in its operation, and does not intend to do so if it can be avoided—and it can be if the present cooperation continues. So far every suggestion made to one of our regulated companies by the aviation supervisor of the Illinois Commerce Commission has been carried out promptly and efficiently.

So also Illinois has contended herself thus far with the following provision in each order:

"It is further ordered that the certificate of convenience and necessity hereinabove ordered to be issued is granted subject to the regulations and air-traffic rules now existing or which may be promulgated either by this commission or any other duly authorized governmental agency."

Of course, a set of rules and regulations for aircraft carriers is necessary, and so we have found already; but the companies flying in Illinois can be assured that they will not be adopted without first an open hearing in which all concerned will have full opportunity to be heard and make suggestions. And even then the first set, with but a few special exceptions, will only concern procedure before the commission in the matter of applications, hearings, change of schedules, reports, etc.

My conclusions on this subject are that the regulation so far has been exceedingly sound and that it should continue in the same careful manner; that all aircraft carriers should cultivate this attitude on the part of the commissions; and that each commission should make a special effort to see that its orders reach the regular channels of publication so that every other commission may have the benefit of this knowledge. To further this cooperation the Illinois Commerce Commission will supply each of your requests in so far as its experience extends.

THE TARIFF POLICY AND CANADIAN INDUSTRIES

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD two articles by Grattan O'Leary, one appearing in this morning's Washington Herald, entitled "Hawley-Smoot Tariff Last Straw to Canada," and the other appearing in this morning's New York American, entitled "Why American Industries Move Their Plants to Canada."

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The articles are as follows:

HAWLEY-SMOOT TARIFF LAST STRAW TO CANADA

By Grattan O'Leary

(Herewith is the first of a series of special articles prepared by Grattan O'Leary, noted Canadian journalist, showing the baneful effects of the Hawley-Smoot Tariff Act and the need for reciprocal trade agreements between Canada and this Nation.)

OTTAWA, February 19.—Premier R. B. Bennett told the Dominion House of Commons this week that during 1931 more than 100 United States industries had established branch factories in Canada. The Dominion Bureau of Statistics shows that American industries are now coming to Canada at a rate of more than two a week.

The Canadian Government is negotiating preferential trade treaties with New Zealand and Australia, waging a campaign to have Canadians buy more of Canadian and Empire goods, preparing for the great Empire Economic Conference which is to be held in Ottawa this summer, and which aims at a self-sustaining economic Empire. As a part of the new imperial economics, Canadians are being exhorted to substitute Empire fruits and vegetables—the products of Australia, South Africa, and the British West Indies—for fruit from California and Florida, for vegetables from other States.

This is the culmination, the direct consequence of more than two decades of futile Canadian effort to secure better trade arrangements with the United States—the result of fruitless protests against the Fordney-McCumber and Hawley-Smoot tariffs.

Between 1911 and 1921 Canadian trade with the United States mounted steadily; Canada's exports grew from $139,000,000 to $542,000,000. At the same time United States sales to Canadians increased to $856,000,000 annually. Canada, in fact, was buying practically one-fourth of the total of American exports.

Then suddenly came the Fordney-McCumber tariff. Its effect, so far as Canada was concerned, was that in one year exports to the United States dropped from $542,000,000 to $292,000,000. So severe was the shock the commercial structure of the Dominion was shaken to its foundations; costs of production in Canada had to be reduced; there was deflation of capital values; farm lands decreased in value by $1,400,000,000.

Canada did not retaliate. Instead, she adjusted her trade and economics to the new conditions, refused to alter her own fiscal policy against the United States, gradually won back her markets. By 1929 she was again selling farm products and raw material to the United States at the rate of $500,000,000 a year.

But Canada bought more goods from the United States than she sold in return. In the 10 years between 1921 and 1931 her 10,000,000 people imported $7,535,000,000 of America's products, this while 110,000,000 Americans were buying about $5,000,000,000 worth of Canadian goods.

The record shows, indeed, that in the years 1923, 1924, and 1925 Canada, disregarding the Fordney-McCumber schedules, actually lowered duties on American products; lowered them on motor cars, on machinery, on farm implements. At any time during this period the Canadian people would have welcomed an offer of reciprocal tariff preferences from the United States.

Then came the Hawley-Smoot Act. This law, which cut off $150,000,000 of Canadian exports to the United States at one fell swoop—this in a year when Canada's American imports had reached a new high record—was the last straw. Disheartened in their long-sustained efforts to trade with their neighbors and upon this continent, and convinced that nothing could be hoped for from the administration at Washington, Canadians began looking toward London.

Messrs. HAWLEY and SMOOT are, in a sense, the real authors of the Empire Economic Conference. They laid its foundations.

* * * * * * *

Canada has begun to copy American fiscal methods. While refusing to admit it, she is, as a matter of fact, retaliating against Washington. She is heightening her general tariff all along the line; she is barring out American goods; compelling American industries to come to Canada to secure the Canadian market; making her own purchases at home and from the empire.

These things are being done without bitterness. They are being done with a realization that, in a large measure, they may not be to the advantage of Canada. For the average Canadian does not visualize a walled-in empire fiscally aloof from the world. What he does feel, however, is that if there is to be a lowering of the tariff wall between the Dominion and the Republic, the first move must come from Washington.

WHY AMERICAN INDUSTRIES MOVE THEIR PLANTS TO CANADA

By Grattan O'Leary

(This is the second in a series of special articles prepared for the New York American and other Hearst newspapers by Mr. O'Leary.)

OTTAWA, February 22.—Between 1880 and 1930, 1,071 United States branch factories established themselves in Canada. They represented an investment of $1,541,000,000.

These factories crossed the line to secure freer access to Canadian markets, to obtain benefits from empire preferences. To-day, with the Canadian tariff against American products the highest in the Dominion's history, this export of United States factories gains in momentum, has increased its speed by about 500 per cent.

Every week sees at least two new American industries set up somewhere in Canada, bringing in millions of capital, work and wages for Canadian workers, purchasing power for the Canadian people, home markets for Canadian farmers, traffic for Canadian railways, business for Canadian ports. Taken altogether, this development has been one of the main factors in tiding the Dominion over the existing depression.

No exact figures are available as to the number of Canadians employed in these branch factories. It is estimated, however, that, taking into account the purchases made from other and allied industries, with the extra employment thus afforded, the addition to the Canadian wage bill runs into hundreds of millions of dollars a year.

This development, good for Canada, not so good for the United States, is, curiously enough, a direct outgrowth of United States policy. It can be traced, and unmistakably, to the Fordney-McCumber and Hawley-Smoot tariffs.

If Americans desire proof of this they can find it in the public speeches of the Canadian Prime Minister, Mr. R. B. Bennett. One quotation from Mr. Bennett will suffice. In his keynote election speech of 1930, he said:

"The United States learned a long time ago that to become a great nation it must look to itself. It developed its industries and its natural resources, encouraged and protected its agriculture, so that out of a slow beginning it has grown to those gigantic proportions where, if the countries affected do not take action, its strength will overflow its border and battle with the under countries it is its avowed purpose, industrially, to subdue. That is the story of the United States. To-day it is more powerful than we, but unless you are content to become its economic vassal, you must do as it did, you must fight for your own."

Mr. Bennett undoubtedly voiced the conclusion of a majority of Canadians. Rightly or wrongly, they became convinced that the United States did not want to purchase Canadian products, that it had gone in for economic imperialism, that it aimed to make Canadians its hewers of wood and drawers of water.

There was the record of what looked like deliberate fiscal aggression against the Dominion. On at least three occasions between 1921 and 1930 Canada lowered duties on American products. Time and again, too, Mr. Mackenzie King, the then Prime Minister of Canada, made reciprocal trade gestures to Washington.

Finally, in 1929, Canada, as an act of friendship to the United States and probably hoping for better tariff terms, prohibited the export of liquor to the Republic, losing millions of revenue in the process. But the only answer of Washington was the Hawley-Smoot tariff, completing what had been begun 10 years before by the Fordney-McCumber schedules.

This was the beginning of the rise of Mr. R. B. Bennett, with his gospel of empire trade. The beginning of increased Canadian duties against the United States with a campaign for Empire preferences; an influx of American industries to Canada.

It is not that Canadians do not wish to trade with their American neighbors. All that the existing Canadian tariff policy means is that Canadian products barred from American markets and repeated pilgrimages to Washington rebuffed, there is a natural seeking for alternative markets.

One friendly gesture from Washington now would bring resumption of the wholesome and mutually profitable trade of 15 years ago.

THE MOTION-PICTURE INDUSTRY

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, in a little while I shall introduce a resolution for an investigation of the motion-picture industry in the firm belief that the inquisitorial powers of the Senate could not be put to more productive use at the present time. Of all businesses not classified as public utilities the movies most directly and intimately affect the public. Affording a ready, albeit brief, refuge from the dullness and care of everyday life, the movies are daily thronged with millions of people. Second only to the homes and schools and churches, they exercise greater influence for good or evil than any other agency. Their influence on the culture, habits, and morals of the public in general is tremendous. Their influence on children and adolescents is incalculable. Being in a very real sense impressed with a public use, this business is nevertheless comparatively unregulated . Not only is it unregulated but it has been permitted by a supine Government to be successfully monopolized. As a result, this tremendous influence is yielded by a small group of men who would never have been chosen by the people, especially the fathers and mothers, as the receptacles for such authority.

In an address on this floor on May 7, 1929, I described conditions in the motion-picture industry in these words:

Ostensibly to "purify" the industry which was falling into disrepute due to scandalous conduct of certain actors and the production of off-color pictures, Will H. Hays, Postmaster General in the Harding Cabinet and former chairman of the Republican National Committee, was called on to spread the formaldehyde. Hays having successfully rescued the party from its burden of debt by measures since revealed, and being regarded as specially qualified as a reformer, undertook the assignment for a miserly stipend, said to be upward of $100,000 a year.

The recent hearings before the Committee on Ways and Means of the House of Representatives on the proposed tax on admissions reveal that Hays's salary now is $250,000 a year.

The declared purpose of Hays's appointment soon faded from view. It may be asserted without fear of contradiction that Mr. Hays has done nothing toward improving the moral tone of the movies. He has from time to time forbid the picturization of certain stories, such as Rain and the Green Hat, but the stories promptly appeared as Sadie Thompson and a Woman of Affairs. Hays may have been hired to give orders to his employers, but there is no obligation on the part of those who pay him to obey such orders.

The truth is that Hays was employed primarily as a "fixer" to protect the industry against any sort of reform or regulation through public action.

The accuracy of this statement has been amply borne out by events occurring subsequent to my address. In December, 1929, the New Work World published a series of articles revealing that the Hays organization had subsidized—a polite word for "bribed"—certain ministers and employees of welfare and reform organizations which were supposed to be engaged, or at least interested, in protecting the public against filthy screen presentations. Thereupon the Churchman, a publication of the Protestant Episcopal Church, and other secular, trade, and lay organs took up the cry, and the industry was threatened with a scandal of the first magnitude. To quiet the hue and cry, and to divert public attention from the corruption that had been revealed, Hays promulgated a new production code, sometimes called the "Hays morality code," which specified with some particularity the scenes and subjects which might not be included in photoplays produced by members of his association.

VICE AND FILTH ON THE SCREEN

Bearing in mind that this code was the third of its kind, its predecessors having been forgotten as soon as made, it was not taken seriously within the industry, although the elaborate publicity given it by the Hays organization served to allay criticism for the time being. That the code has been openly flaunted by Hays's own members, who produce 98 per cent of the pictures shown in this country, is admitted in the industry itself. Mr. Martin Quigley, publisher of a chain of papers relating to the movies, and whose revenue is derived from producer advertising, writing under the caption "The Code Neglected and Scorned," recently charged the producers with flagrant disregard of this code. I have cited Mr. Quigley because he had been identified with the industry for years, is a competent observer, and in no sense a reformer or professional critic. Therefore, I repeat that the so-called Hays code, the industry's only effort at self-regulation, is admittedly a failure, and that this fact is well understood in the industry itself.

Mr. Hays, however, accomplished his main and, perhaps, only object. The indignation following the revelations of the New York World was smothered in the pæans of praise that followed the promulgation of the code. In the meantime no improvement was discernible in the quality or moral tone of the pictures released. On the contrary, due to the anxiety of the producers to make pictures that would be pleasing to the audiences patronizing their own big-town theaters, the product became even more degrading. Last year it was the fashion to exploit—I might say exalt—the gangster on the screen, and the studios gave forth an uninterrupted stream of pictures featuring lawlessness, hoodlumism, and vice for the entertainment, not to say edification, of the impressionable young minds of the country.

While some gangster films are still being made, the trend this season is definitely toward prostitution. Let me read a brief excerpt from the December 7, 1931, issue of Time, a well-known weekly publication, the piece in question being a review of a current picture called "Possessed." I ask that this excerpt may be printed in the RECORD, without reading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KEAN in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

The excerpt is as follows:

POSSESSED (METRO-GOLDWYN-MAYER)

If, as is generally supposed, the cinema has an important influence upon the behavior of cinemaddicts, there will presently be a large increase in the total number of United States strumpets. Norma Shearer, Constance Bennett, Elissa Landi, Helen Hayes, Claudette Colbert, Tallulah Bankhead, Evelyn Brent, Greta Garbo, Ruth Chatterton, Marlene Dietrich, and Genevieve Tobin have all in recent pictures attractively performed functions ranging from noble prostitution to carefree concupiscence. A Free Soul, Strangers May Kiss, Susan Lennox: Her Fall and Rise, Once a Lady, Morocco, Body and Soul, An American Tragedy, The Sin of Madelon Claudet, My Sin, The Smiling Lieutenant, Born to Love prove that the typical 1931 cinema heroine is a bad example.

Possessed is calculated to have a more disastrous effect than most upon morally malleable persons who witness it. Joan Crawford, again a brunette, impersonates the mistress of a thriving politician (Clark Gable). Rich, willful, and ingratiating, he gives her the trite benefits of illicit love—an apartment with glass doors, a maid of all work, fine clothes, European travel, and an education in social politeness. These make an unsophisticated admirer, when they meet again, mistake her for a lady. After three years of pleasurable intimacy, Gable is threatened by a scandal. His mistress has been ennobled by experience and she defends his conduct in an impromptu speech to a political gathering. The speech is so dextrous, so sincere, that it prompts cheers and a conclusion in which matrimony is implied.

Clark Gable has now been leading man to each of Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer's three leading stars. In A Free Soul he delivered a punch to the chin of Cinemactress Shearer; in Susan Lennox he managed to control an impulse to do likewise to Greta Garbo. In this picture, his second with Miss Crawford, either the restraining influence of the Hays organization or the enervation of Hollywood success affected Clark Gable. In the best scene of the picture he hits his leading lady with an open hand. Thirty years old, he has had three wives, all older than himself. The present Mrs. Gable, whom he married twice, is 40. Everyone knows that he receives more fan letters than any other male actor in Hollywood, smokes a pipe, likes horses, hopes to retire in 10 years. He looks a little young for his rôle in Possessed, but he gives a sharp, competent performance.

Mr. BROOKHART. The actors and actresses who have portrayed these degrading rôles are the headliners of the screen. Their doings, their habits, their whims are chronicled in countless publications. The average boy or girl knows as much about these actors—sometimes more—than they know about those who run the Government. They are the idols of the young people of the land. I leave you to judge, therefore, of the effect on their plastic minds of the playing of such glamorous rôles as those described in Time by their favorites of the screen.

Dr. Fred Eastman, professor of religious literature and drama, Chicago Theological Seminary, has articles in the October and November issues of the Parents' Magazine entitled "Are Movies Fit for Children?" I wish that every Member of the Senate and every mother and father in the land would read these articles. The articles contain the results of a careful study of the effects of movies on children—how they are affected by the scenes of violence and lurid love-making portrayed on the screen. Doctor Eastman also reviews the many promises of reform made by Mr. Hays, and contrasts those promises with the performances of the industry. Under the heading "Performances," Doctor Eastman quotes from recent movie advertisements clipped from metropolitan newspapers. You will bear in mind that these metropolitan theaters are owned by the producers themselves and that therefore these ads are the industry's own description of the pictures put before the children.

I ask that these advertisements be inserted in the RECORD at this point without reading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The advertisements are as follows:

Sex appeal? These three babies have everything—roguish eyes, come-hither smiles, shapely legs, and curves that would make Ziegfeld green with envy. And do they give the boys a red-hot lesson in Parisian whoopee making? Children, always 25 cents.

Sweetie becomes the Bernhardt of the screen! Dimpled dynamite, professional good-time girl. She "took" suckers, sinners, and saints until one made her beg for love.

Surprising adventure of a beautiful sales girl who preferred sin in silks to love without luxury.

All the fun of X plus warmer mamas! The roughnecks of X are kissing the French cuties, but clouting hard in all languages! More loving sweeties! Fifi D'Orsay, the Parisienne temptress de luxe.

Spain is the locale of this romance, and the action, to be more specific, takes place in a dance hall and in the arms of two women. X is cast as the impassioned dancer, who is holding her man with animal magnetism.

To-day. The modern woman scorns the fidelity of yesterday, the love that endured for better for worse. To-day married women take all they can, trifle now and then, and give hubbie the air when things go bad; that is the woman of to-day, a blazing exposé of new moralities, new conventions.

The electrifying truth about gangland's sex-appeal stool pigeons!

Let's go native. Imagine this merry gang of young moderns cut loose on a South Sea isle. A glowing hula moon their only chaperon—women and whoopee. Children, all day 20 cents.

Broadway jolted by this racy, risque, daring, sophisticated cyclone. You'll yell to see this bachelor as he becomes a father on his wedding eve.

She begged him: Let's keep from marriage as long as we can. I'm afraid of it—afraid of its intimacies, its pettiness; its quarrels will kill our love! If I, the woman, do not ask for marriage, why should you, the man? Story of a modern girl in love.

A revealing peek through the keyholes of married ladies' boudoirs.

Never before has the screen dared to tell so shocking, so startling a story! A woman of the streets married to a brilliant man of wealth during a wild midnight orgy.

Mr. BROOKHART. The department of research and education of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America has made a report on the public relations of the motion-picture industry, the wording of which was so temperate in view of its startling disclosures that it has been severely criticized by the more active advocates of reform. I desire to read to the Senate certain excerpts from this report, published June 29, 1931, and ask that the Senate note the resemblance between the methods used by the Motion-Picture Trust and the Power Trust to influence and control public opinion through the activities of hired agents masquerading as disinterested public-spirited citizens. The report in this particular is somewhat stronger than on other phases, because the council in the course of its investigation found that some of its own staff were in an equivocal situation, a situation that was properly dealt with, as revealed in the report. I read from page 148 of the printed report.

I ask that the report be inserted in the RECORD at this point without reading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The article is as follows:

But some of the methods employed by the Hays organization, discussed in the text of this report, in winning approval for the industry and support for its program raise serious questions. They have contributed much to the attitude of questioning and suspicion to which we have referred. It is not sufficient that plausible reasons may be assigned for the relationships assumed and maintained. The fact that persons responsibly placed who received honoraria from the industry for varied services may be presumed in every case to have rendered only services which the recipient thought warranted does not avail as a justification.

To be sure, these methods are not uncommon. They were made familiar to the American public through the investigation of the public-utilities propaganda three years ago. It may even be argued that the chief significance of the facts here disclosed is in calling attention to the vague and indefinite ethics of the business community. But an organization that is avowedly attempting to improve the moral standards of its members and is inviting the public to render whole-hearted cooperation in this effort must use methods that are above suspicion. The payment of an honorarium to an administrative official of a religious organization by a trade association at a time when policies are being formulated in which that association has an obvious interest invites a damaging interpretation when the facts are disclosed. And the payment of honoraria, in whatever form it may appear on the books, to a field representative of a religious organization in recognition of services rendered on the platform, when all the while the public knows nothing of such a financial arrangement, is bound, when disclosed, to undermine public confidence on both sides, and to give rise to sinister inferences. As has been stated in the report, we have found no evidence that the services rendered to the industry in the cases involving the Federal council were not conscientiously rendered. But the fact that sincere people can become involved so easily in this kind of arrangement only to find themselves presently in an impossible position, makes the practices in question all the more serious.

Mr. BROOKHART. The charge that I made in this body in 1929 that Hays was not employed to clean up the movies, and that he was retained merely as a smoke screen to protect the industry against molestation by public authority while it carried out its reckless program of capitalizing filth, is amply borne out by the report. This feature of the report is so important that I shall read an excerpt from the summary dealing with it, in the hope that it may be brought to the attention of the millions of interested parents, theatergoers, ministers, and leaders of public opinion who still regard Will Hays, the great promulgator of morality codes, as the spiritual director and czar of the movies. It is with sorrow that I lift the crown and snatch away the royal robes and reveal this poor politician in his true insignificance, but it is in the public interest that this be done:

The prime requisite for an adequate test of cooperative measures is a clearer understanding on the part of socially minded people of the function of the Hays organization as the producers and distributors themselves understand it. The frequent reference to Mr. Hays as a "czar" of the industry is misleading. We find no ground for such a claim to power on his behalf, yet the circumstances of the creation of Mr. Hays's office were such as to encourage it, and Mr. Hays's assurances that the industry "stands at attention" to do the will of disinterested public groups, suggest some extraordinary power on his part. Thus it has come about that critics of the industry have tended to draw one of two inferences—either the organization is impotent to do what Mr. Hays and his associates would like to accomplish or it is a "smoke screen" to deceive the public and to cover purposes of a narrowly selfish character.

The fact seems to be that the producers and distributors never intended to delegate to Mr. Hays arbitrary power but that they have looked to him and to his organization to negotiate, so to speak, with an insistent public opinion in a way to accommodate the industry to inevitable changes in standards with the least possible loss to a group of profit-making enterprises.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, would it interrupt the thread of the Senator's speech if I should ask him a question at this point?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. BROOKHART. The only objection I have is that it may interfere with my getting through in time so that the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] can proceed to the consideration of his bill at 2 o'clock. However, I yield for a question.

Mr. KING. I want to ask the Senator whether he is suggesting any remedy to deal with this evil, whether he is suggesting strengthening the antitrust laws or constraining, if we can, by public opinion the Department of Justice to institute the necessary actions to dissolve the trust monopoly or to cause it to be resolved into proper constituent elements? The Motion-Picture Trust, in my opinion, has exerted its power in an oppressive manner, to the injury of the industry and to the crushing of legitimate competition in all branches of such industry.

Mr. BROOKHART. In answer to the Senator's question, I will say "yes" to each branch of it. I shall at the conclusion of my address introduce a bill proposing to strengthen the antitrust laws. I shall call the attention of the Department of Justice to violations of that law, and I shall ask an investigation by the Senate into the facts, which will disclose what I am relating here, and, of course, far more than I am able to relate.

Mr. KING. If the Senator from Iowa will pardon me further, the Judiciary Committee has before it several measures asking for investigations in regard to the antitrust laws and violations thereof, and also as to whether the antitrust statutes should be strengthened or modified. I am sure that the committee, when it shall take up for consideration these bills, will be glad to hear the Senator present his views.

Mr. BROOKHART. I shall be delighted to do so.

THE EVILS OF BLOCK BOOKING

Mr. President, the only point of contact between the motion-picture industry and the public is the theater, and it is to the theater owner that the public should look for protection in the matter of indecent pictures. However, the larger theaters in the large cities have virtually all come under the ownership or control of the producers themselves and are operated by hired managers, who have no choice as to the pictures they must play. The producer-owned houses must first play the pictures released by the parent company and in addition must play the pictures of the theater-owning producers who play pictures of such parent company in their theaters. There is no incentive for the manager to study the likes and dislikes of his patrons, since his program is arranged by the home office in New York and is the product of the mutual back scratching of the big producers. And since the producer-owned theaters are for the most part located in the down-town sections of the large cities, the producers are primarily interested in making pictures that will appeal to the audiences attending such theaters, which audiences differ greatly from the less sophisticated audiences which attend the neighborhood and small-town theaters.

These neighborhood and small-town houses serve the bulk of the family trade, including the children, but the owners of these independent houses have little or no choice as to the pictures they play because of a most obnoxious industry practice known as block booking. Under this practice an independent theater owner may not select such of the pictures of a producer as are best suited to his patrons but must buy the entire block of pictures offered by such producer, such block containing the producer's entire output for one year. These blocks range in size from 26 feature pictures to 80. In addition to forcing its entire output of feature pictures, a producer will insist that a theater owner buy also its short subjects, comedies, and the like, and its weekly news reel. Not only must the independent theater owner buy a producer's entire output but he must buy the pictures sight-unseen and usually before they are made and almost always before they have been released.

The producers try to justify the practice as mere wholesale selling, but this and every other suggested analogy fails, because in no other line of business is the retailer required to accept and force on his customers a large amount of unsuitable, even rotten, goods in order to get a small amount that is good.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. BROOKHART. I yield.

Mr. DAVIS. Does the Senator's proposed bill cover the distribution of the pictures?

Mr. BROOKHART. It covers the block-booking practice.

The producers also have attempted to convey the impression that the practice has grown or is growing into disuse, but independent theater owners testifying before the Ways and Means Committee of the House a few weeks ago denied this claim and asserted that the practice is being enforced more rigidly than ever. Moreover, the Allied States Association of Motion Picture Exhibitors, representing only the independent theater owners, at its convention in Chicago in February, 1931, adopted a resolution reciting that the practice is enforced by all producers and condemning it in the strongest terms.

That this practice prevents the independent theater owner from selecting pictures adapted to the taste and needs of his patrons and deprives the public of the right of holding such exhibitor responsible for showing indecent and vicious pictures is too clear to require argument. However, the Federal Council of Churches, in the report heretofore referred to, makes this finding, as shown by the following excerpt from the conclusions, which I ask may be inserted in the RECORD without reading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, leave is granted.

The matter referred to is as follows:

With reference to block booking and blind booking, it is beyond question that this "wholesale merchandising," as the industry calls it, puts the exhibitor of exceptional taste and conscientiousness at a great disadvantage. If he does not know precisely what he is contracting for, and if he receives undesirable pictures beyond the limit of his canceling privilege, he is powerless to maintain standards. The system is undoubtedly an obstacle to the efforts of patrons of the theaters to place responsibility for the choice of films directly upon the exhibitor.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, the Department of Labor of the Dominion of Canada recently completed an investigation of alleged violation of the combines act by the motion-picture industry in Canada. The report by Commissioner Peter White, which resulted in wholesale indictments against the industry in Ontario, shows that selling methods in Canada are the same as in the United States. On the subject of block booking and the effect of that practice on the independent exhibitors the report says—and I ask, Mr. President, that the quotation may be inserted in the RECORD without reading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Practically every exhibitor who gave evidence stated that he could not select the pictures which he wished to show, but was forced by reason of this system of block booking to buy the whole of the group of pictures which is offered to him, or a substantial part thereof, and that this has four principal effects:

(1) The independent has to buy from one exchange more pictures than he desires to buy from that exchange, and his requirements for the season thus being filled with three or four exchanges, he is unable to purchase pictures from the other exchanges at all.

(2) He is forced to buy more pictures than he can possibly show in his theater.

(3) He is forced to buy undesirable pictures and ones which he would not purchase or exhibit were he not forced to contract in this way.

(4) He is in difficulties with the exchanges with whom he has contracted at the end of the year and has to make some arrangement, either by payment for the pictures, or by partial payment, or by taking again from that exchange more pictures for the following season than he wants. In many instances exhibitors find themselves with awards of arbitration boards against them, which, if not complied with, involve the theater holders in further difficulties, as will appear later in dealing with the arbitration clause of the standard exhibition contract.

It may be argued that the independent exhibitor does not need to overbuy, and that if he does it is his own fault. It is quite apparent to me, however, from the attitude of the independent exhibitors who appeared as witnesses, that there is on their part a real anxiety as to whether they will be able to obtain a supply of suitable pictures at reasonable prices to enable them to operate their theaters. True, there are enough pictures to go around, and if an exhibitor is content to exhibit to his patrons the poorer and cheaper class of pictures he can probably obtain sufficient of these and is, in fact, in the position of having to exhibit many of them. This anxiety is accentuated by reason of the undoubted fact that Famous Players has the first opportunity in the matter of selection. The system of block booking and blind booking and the fact that Famous Players has first choice of selection are responsible for this condition of affairs.

Mr. BROOKHART. Professor Eastman in the articles heretofore adverted to has this to say on the subject, and I also ask that his statement may be inserted in the RECORD without reading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Who is responsible for this situation in the movies? The Motion-Picture Trust is responsible, for it has a virtual monopoly on American movies. The United States Supreme Court, in a decision handed down a few months ago, declared that the leading motion-picture concerns were in a combination in restraint of trade and in violation of the antitrust laws. Since these corporations have a monopoly of the industry they must accept responsibility for the products of that industry.

How did a few great movie corporations gain control of an industry so vitally important to the social and spiritual welfare of our children and our Nation? By three simple steps: First, by buying up strings of local theaters so that they control not only the means of production and distribution but of exhibition as well. Second, by installing a system of block booking and blind booking by which exhibitors are compelled to buy their pictures in blocks of 26 or 52, even as many as 80 pictures in a single block, the bad along with the good, without the right of choosing the ones best suited to their own clientele. To be accurate and fair, it should be said that the exhibitors have the privilege of rejecting 5 per cent of the pictures sent them under certain difficult conditions, but what is 5 per cent among so many poor pictures? Blind booking is the system by which exhibitors must order their pictures without having the right to see them, often before the pictures are even made. * * *

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, I will again advert to this subject in dealing with the failure of the governmental agencies to enforce the law against the Motion-Picture Trust.

Representatives of the Hays office doubtless will release a flood of propaganda to the effect that block booking is the only way in which motion pictures can be sold. The quick answer is that the Haysites themselves abandon block booking and sell pictures singly or in small groups whenever it is to their interest to do so. Thus Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer, having sold its pictures for the current season in a block and on the most onerous terms, has canceled out of the block one particularly good picture, called "Emma," and is endeavoring to resell it to the theater owners at exorbitant prices. All or nearly all producers reserve the right to cancel a few pictures out of their blocks and to resell them at higher prices after the box-office value of those pictures has been demonstrated. That they can and do sell singly under such circumstances is a conclusive answer to the contention that to do so is impracticable, as well as an indictment of the fairness and business ethics of the motion-picture producers.

UNREASONABLE PROTECTION

As soon as the producers began acquiring and operating theaters a marked change occurred in their attitude toward the independent theater owners. The producers ceased to regard the latter as customers and treated them as competitors. This change in policy has been disastrous to all parties concerned. It has been disastrous for the independent exhibitors because the producers have exerted all power inherent in their control of both the film and the theaters to drive the independents out of business. It has been disastrous to the producers because by driving out thousands of independent theaters they restricted the market for films and placed themselves at the mercy of their competitors. It was disastrous to the public because they lost valuable points of contact with the industry.

The competitive methods employed to drive out the independent theaters constitute one of the most shocking chapters in the annals of American business. Two of the less oppressive methods employed, the foundation of each of which was a boycott, were found by the Supreme Court to be violative of the Sherman law. The first of these was the practice of compelling exhibitors to arbitrate differences under unfair and one-sided contracts before alleged arbitration boards—which I have heretofore characterized as "kangaroo courts"—and whose awards were enforced by a boycott. This practice was condemned in Paramount-Famous Players-Lasky Corporation against United States, decided on November 24, 1930. The other was the practice of requiring independent exhibitors to file with the film boards of trade, set up by the Hays office, elaborate information concerning the intimate details of their business, and to assume the contracts of preceding operators of their theaters, all on pain of being boycotted for neglect or refusal to do so. This practice was happily ended by the Supreme Court in United States against First National Pictures Corporation, also decided on November 24, 1930.

Another intolerable practice was to threaten an independent theater owner that unless he bought the pictures of certain theater-operating producers the latter would build in opposition to him. These theater-owning producers also made agreements, one with another, to sell each other their entire product, thus cutting off independent theaters competitive with the chain houses from adequate supplies. These mutual back-scratching arrangements even go so far as to give the chains exclusive rights to pictures, not only in every town in which they now operate but in all other towns in which the chain may acquire or build theaters during the life of the franchise.

But the most flagrant, the most oppressive, and, in my judgment, most clearly illegal of all is the practice known as protection. "Protection" is the time that elapses between the playing of a picture by a first-run house and the playing of the same picture by a subsequent run house. As is indicated by its name, it was first devised to protect the theater paying a high film rental for the privilege of first showing the picture against the unfair competition of a house paying a lower rental and showing the same picture at the same time or so soon thereafter as to detract unfairly from the first run. Originally, it was a competitive advantage, kept within reasonable bounds, and available to all who were willing to pay for the privilege. Now it is the instrument whereby the producers acting in concert through the local exchanges withhold the pictures for so long a time after the same have been shown by their own chain houses that independent exhibitors are unable to attract patrons to their houses because of the staleness of their product.

This practice has been and is the most effective weapon for driving out competition that has ever been devised, and the manner in which it has been used by the Motion-Picture Trust is a blot on American business and fair play.

Not only is it enforced for periods of from 30 days to 6 months as between chain and independent theaters in the same competitive zone in a single city, but protection for like periods is given city chain houses over independent houses in towns from 30 to 40 miles distant. The absurdity of this is apparent when we reflect that while a city theater may under certain conditions draw patronage from the small towns, it almost never happens that a small town draws patronage from a large city. The utter insincerity of it is manifest when we consider that an independent house, rated to-day as a B or C house and held back in playing time, if acquired by the trust at once becomes an A house, and moves forward in playing time.

I have here, and will send to the Committee on Interstate Commerce, a schedule of protection given the Paramount-

Publix theaters in New England over the independent houses. To appreciate the illegality of this schedule you must bear in mind that it is observed by the supposedly competing producers, members of the Hays organization, and is imposed on the independent theaters without consultation with them and without their consent. The element of combination and conspiracy could not be clearer. It is as illegal as a price agreement or a division of territory among interstate competitors would be. I invite the attention of the Senate to the thoroughness with which it has been worked out. It lists the towns that may run 2 weeks after Boston; those that may run 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, and 9 weeks after Boston.

I also have, and will send to the committee, the Paramount-Publix protection schedule covering the cities of Minneapolis and St. Paul and surrounding territory. This schedule was formulated and is enforced in the same way as the New England schedules. Similar schedules are enforced in favor of the producer-owner chains throughout the United States. Attacks are being made on their legality by independent theater owners in Nebraska, Ohio, and Massachusetts. The State of Wisconsin, through the department of agriculture and markets, has just issued a complaint against the trust involving this practice. The Department of Justice on April 19, 1929, obtained an indictment against the Fox west coast theaters and the producers in California. But a deal was made with the defendants, and as a result the indictment was dismissed and was replaced by a civil suit, which was terminated on the same day by the entry of a consent decree.

Before I leave this subject I should like to call the attention of the Senate to another important phase of this subject, which has a social as well as an economic bearing. Independent theaters, due to the depression and the reduced spending power of their patrons, have in many instances sought to reduce admission prices so that the victims of the depression might continue to patronize their theaters. This class of persons needs diversion and entertainment more than any other. The efforts of the independent theaters to meet their needs was laudable and should have been encouraged. However, the producers were concerned lest these price reductions affect their water-logged, high-overhead, inefficiently managed houses. They therefore resorted to the zoning and protection schedules as a means of holding up prices. Thus the playing time of independent theaters has been coupled to admission prices, and the lower the admission charged the longer an independent house must wait for a picture.

For example, in the Minnesota schedule, on page 8, we find the protection afforded the Paramount Theater in Bismarck, N. Dak. This example is chosen at random, and happens to refer to the neighboring State of North Dakota. I invite the attention of the Senate to the manner in which admission prices are controlled. The basic protection given over Mandan and New Salem is 21 days; that is, when admission prices in those towns are over 35 cents. As admission prices descend, the protection increases. Thus when admissions are 35 cents, protection is 45 days; 30 cents and 60 days; 25 cents and 90 days; 20 cents and 120 days. Then comes the following general provision, common to all of these schedules:

Six months on houses charging 15 cents and under.

Similar provisions will be found throughout the New England schedule. In addition to these provisions in the schedules, the standard exhibition contract on which pictures are sold to the theaters on a flat rental basis limits admissions to a minimum of 10 cents. But, most effective of all, the contracts which provide that the rental shall be a certain percentage of the receipts—which contracts are growing in use, due to the added privileges conferred on the producers—provide absolutely the admission prices that must be charged. In addition, these contracts permit the producer to specify the days on which the pictures shall be played. Thus under the grasping policies of the producers both the admission prices of the independent houses and their playing policy are dictated from the offices of the trust in New York.

In order that the Senate may appreciate the effect of these policies on the public, let me cite the case of a theater owner in New England who had booked a certain picture for a split week which included Ash Wednesday. His reason for booking this picture for that day was that he deemed it the most suitable of the pictures available for that solemn season. Later, the exchange manager for the producer canceled the booking, and compelled the exhibitor to run a less suitable picture that had been bought on a flat rental basis. It is well known that the producers will not permit percentage pictures, which are of the better kind, to be played during the week before Christmas or in Holy Week, when attendance is slim, and insist that exhibitors play straight rental pictures, on which they absorb all the loss.

POLLUTING THE WELLS

In proposing this broad investigation of the industry I am particularly concerned about the charges that the Hays organization has been active in getting control of organizations to which the public and the independent theater owners have a right to look for protection against the excesses and depredations of the motion-picture producers.

I have heard many expressions of disappointment from persons interested in preserving decent standards on the screen upon their learning that speakers and lecturers to whom they had listened with confidence and respect were on the Hays pay roll.

I am told that thousands have listened to Mrs. Thomas G. Winter, who was designated by the Federation of Women's Clubs to be a connecting link with Hollywood, without knowing that she is in reality an employee of the Hays office.

The January, 1930, issue of the Motion Picture, a so-called fan magazine read by thousands of theater goers, contains an article by Mrs. Winter in which she, ostensibly on behalf of the public, propounds questions to former Governor Milliken, of the Hays office, who answers them on behalf of the industry. The questions and answers are artfully contrived to dispose of such matters as block booking in such a manner as to lead the public to believe that there is no basis for the numerous and persistent complaints on these subjects.

Harrison's Reports, a trade paper published in the interest of the independent theater owners, in its issue for January 18, 1930, reveals the facts, as well as the false and misleading nature of the statements regarding block booking.

The report of the Federal Council of Churches goes into this subject—somewhat gingerly I am sorry to say—but enough is shown to indicate that the Hays organization maintains, or at least utilizes, a vast corps of under-cover agents engaged in propaganda favorable to the Motion-Picture Trust, and whom the public regard as public-spirited citizens with no ulterior motive or sinister attachment.

Let me read a few paragraphs from the report dealing with this subject.

Mr. President, I desire to insert in the RECORD that portion of the report.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, leave is granted.

The matter referred to is as follows:

A list of 759 persons was submitted to the Hays organization including all those whose connection with its work was such as to suggest the possibility of a financial relationship. A sworn statement from the treasurer of the Hays organization covering the years 1928, 1929, and 1930 shows the payments made, both honoraria and expenses, to any of these persons. The statement shows that in the cases of 52 of them expenses incurred in connection with attendance at various conferences or the giving of addresses have been met by the Hays organization. In the majority of these, however, the payment covered only one conference. Some very liberal payments of expense accounts have been made. In a few cases honoraria were paid for addresses given. In no such case except the one noted below was the recipient in a position of responsibility in an organization cooperating with the industry or the Hays organization. Those receiving expenses for travel and entertainment, however, included influential persons connected with social and religious organizations. Some of them were cooperating actively with the Hays organization in winning support for its cooperation program and opposing censorship. What seems significant from the point of view of public policy is the fact that the resources of the Hays organization have apparently always been available to insure the presence of individuals useful to its program at important meetings of their own organizations or gatherings where they could obtain a hearing. Important meetings have been "watched" by trained eyes and the methods of skilled diplomacy have been used to promote the interests of the industry among the membership of great national organizations. Much of the time and strength of the Hays organization seems to have been given to cultivating persons of influence, gaining the favor of organizations and organization committees, and seeking to clear the road of legislative or other obstacles to its program.

Beginning in January, 1928, and continuing through August, 1929, the senior general secretary of the Federal Council, whose active relationship to the council terminated at the end of 1930, received an honorarium of $150 a month from the Hays organization for services which were defined as the giving of advice concerning religious motion pictures and questions arising in the industry which related to religion. This fact was not known to the officers of the Federal council at the time. It was reported to them by the secretary concerned in January, 1930, shortly before the present inquiry got under way.

Mr. BROOKHART. Like operations have been carried on by the Motion Picture Distributors and Exhibitors of Canada, the Canadian branch of the Hays organization, as shown by the report of Commissioner White heretofore mentioned. On page 211 the commissioner quotes from a report by a representative of the Local Council of Women for Saskatchewan, in which the writer swallows, hook, line, and sinker, the idea, propagated by the Haysites in Canada, that one Colonel Cooper, an employee of the Hays organization, is censoring pictures in the public interest. Commissioner White remarks:

It is almost amusing, if it were not pathetic, to learn that Colonel Cooper has succeeded in convincing this good lady that he, employed and paid as he is by the United States producers, is standing between them and the public in the matter of censorship, when, as a matter of fact, his activities in regard to censorship and those of his organization have been directed toward a relaxation and criticism of the standard set up by the various censor boards in Canada. * * *

The report deals with instances where Colonel Cooper offered honoraria to various members of censor boards in Canada for speeches or other service, and how those offers were declined by the patriotic women thus approached. I should like to know, as I am sure the public would like to know, how many similar offers have been made to corresponding officials in the United States, and how many have been declined.

Not only has the Hays organization sought to influence and control welfare agencies, public speakers, and the like, but it has reached into and attempted to control the trade organizations of theater owners. The national association known as the Motion Picture Theater Owners of America, once an independent, aggressive group, has largely been absorbed by the Hays organization. At the Toronto convention of this association in 1928, through the manipulation of the Haysites, 7 producer-controlled chain directors out of a total of 10 were placed on the board of directors. Thereafter the producer-owned chain theaters paid dues in this organization in accordance with a budget worked out in the Hays office. The yearly payment by the chains under this arrangement is said to be $75,000 annually.

The taking over of the Motion Picture Theater Owners of America by Hays led to the formation by certain independent theater owners of the Allied States Association of Motion Picture Exhibitors. The leaders of this organization have refused to render homage to Mr. Hays or to obey his will. As a result, Hays and his associates have attempted in every way known to them to block and disrupt the Allied States Association. In an effort to lure away the local officers, Mr. C. C. Pettijohn, Hays's chief lieutenant, openly announced that he would put the chain theaters into local associations as dues-paying members, provided those locals were "constructive," by which he meant "conformed to the Hays policies."

When Allied sought to negotiate with a certain producer, one of Mr. Hays's members, for pictures for its members, the Allied leaders were told that they must first sign a paper agreeing to cease their agitation against compulsory arbitration, which was later held unlawful by the Supreme Court; in other words, that these independent theater owners must acquiesce in violations of the Federal law as the price of entering into a legitimate arrangement with one of the Hays members. Other business arrangements and attempted deals on behalf of the independent theaters have met with like opposition from Hays. According to my information, the latter now is making a final desperate effort to break down the independent organization, and to establish the subservient Motion Picture Theater Owners of America as the dominant factor in the exhibition field.

The policy of controlling exhibitor organizations and snuffing out any spirit of independence on their part is a settled one with the Hays organization, and is not peculiar to the United States. This policy was carried out in Canada by organizing and financing the exhibitor organization through Colonel Cooper, heretofore referred to. I desire to read into the RECORD at this point the findings in reference to Hays's activities in exhibitor affairs in the Dominion. I refer so frequently to this Canadian report because the policies and practices of the industry are the same on both sides of the boundary line, and the Canadian Government has been alert enough to inquire into these abuses and reveal them for the first time.

I ask that that report be inserted in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, that will be done.

The report is as follows:

The evidence, without going into particulars, clearly discloses that the Cooper organization is a mere offshoot of a corresponding organization in the United States, presided over by Mr. Will Hays and referred to as the "Hays organization"; the policies being dictated by, the finances controlled by, budgets subject to the approval of, and the activities generally subject to the control and direction of the Hays organization. The minutes are submitted to New York, and also the proceedings of the Film Boards of Trade, and the New York office is consulted, not only on important matters, such as censorship in Canada and amusement tax, but also on matters which might be considered almost routine.

From the constitution of this body, it is quite clear that it is a combination of producers, distributors, and Famous Players, and, it being quite as true to-day as when first uttered that "where your treasure is, there will your heart be also," and, it being the case that, with the exception of $480 contributed by Famous Players and their affiliations above named, and except relatively small fees paid by Canadian distributing companies, the revenue is directly or indirectly supplied by the producer members and collected in New York, it is obvious that the interest of this association and its officers is entirely that of the distributors, and through them, of the producers. Famous Players, through its financial support, through its membership, and through the activities of its officers, has been a part and parcel of the Cooper organization from the beginning, and completely identified with its activities.

Mr. BROOKHART. I have heard it asserted by theater owners—and I have talked and corresponded with scores of them—that there are exhibitor leaders posing as independents to-day, who are receiving money, directly or indirectly, from the producers; who merely render lip service to the exhibitors they are supposed to protect. It is in the interest of morals and decency that such men be exposed.

Let me now move on to a suggestion that is even more startling. We all know of the important publicity medium known as the news weekly. These news reels, issued by the big producing companies twice a week, are shown in all theaters as an integral part of the program. Control of these reels, if exerted for political purposes or to obtain immunity for the trust, would be a powerful weapon in the hands of a man like Hays. I have no definite proof that it has been used in this way; but there is enough in the article I am about to read to put us on guard, and warrant a searching inquiry. The article is from the issue of Harrison's Reports for November 22, 1930, and is in answer to criticism of an independent exhibitor leader in Chicago, who attempted to support a candidate for judge, who was believed to be fair to the independents.

I ask that that article be inserted in the RECORD at this point.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

WHEN THE INDEPENDENT EXHIBITOR USES THE PRODUCERS' TACTICS

The producers, particularly the Hays organization's executives, tore their clothes and pulled their hair in protest against the action of Mr. Saperstein, the president of the independent exhibitor organization in the Chicago zone, in indorsing a local candidate for judge, urging the members of his organization to put slides on their screens recommending to the patrons to vote for that candidate. They pointed out how injurious it is for the industry to get into politics and implored them, as well as every exhibitor in the United States, to remain neutral.

In 1920 C. C. Pettijohn, Mr. Will H. Hays's right-hand man, received $30,000 from the Republican Party for inserting subtle propaganda in the late Selznick news weekly.

You may say that this has been long ago and that his views have now changed. I am going to present evidence to prove to you that his views have not changed. In the governorship campaign in this State two years ago, Pettijohn induced the Democrats of this city to pay him for preparing a propaganda reel for Governor Roosevelt. He charged them for the prints 3½ cents a foot when it could have been done for no more than 2½ cents a foot. I believe he sold them 100 reels.

During the last presidential campaign the Paramount Theater in this city showed five news weekly shots of the one candidate to one of the other candidate. The Capitol Theater cut out from the news reels every shot that showed one of the two candidates.

It is well for the producer-distributors to use their theaters and news weeklies for political propaganda, but when the independent exhibitor uses his screen for his protection it is either a crime or a sin.

Mr. BROOKHART. From the same publication for May 23, 1931, I quote an article that strikes even closer to home, and which I ask to have inserted in the RECORD at this point.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

WHAT INFLUENCES ARE DELAYING ACTION IN THE BLOCK-BOOKING ORDER AGAINST PARAMOUNT?

On August 30, 1921, the Federal Trade Commission screwed up its courage and issued a complaint against Famous Players-Lasky Corporation charging it with various monopolistic practices, including block booking. Counsel of the commission prosecuted the case vigorously and effectively, compiling a large record of damaging evidence.

Before the case could be argued to the commission a number of changes had been made in the personnel of the commission, and the three to two Democratic majority that existed when the complaint was issued was reversed by the appointment on the commission of Van Fleet, Humphrey, and Hunt, all Republicans.

On the first argument the defendant claimed that it had not been permitted to introduce certain evidence in its behalf, and the case was remanded for further testimony.

When the case came before the commission again Commissioner Van Fleet had been replaced by Abram Myers, now president of Allied States Association of Motion Picture Exhibitors, the organization that represents the independent exhibitor theater owners. In the meantime counsel for the commission had been switched and Martin A. Morrison, a lame-duck Congressman, related to Commissioner Humphrey in some way, had succeeded him.

Morrison practically abandoned the entire case, except the charge of block booking, and on July 9, 1927, the commission issued a "cease and desist" order against this practice.

Famous Players-Lasky, now Paramount-Publix, indicated that it would not obey the order, and the commission started proceedings before the United States circuit court of appeals in New York City to test and to enforce the order. But since that time nothing seems to have been done in the matter, even though the commission is aware of the fact that Paramount-Publix has been violating the order. In the regular course the case should have been disposed of long ago.

A representative of the commission, when asked why the commission has not yet proceeded in the case, stated that there are not enough funds available for the printing of the record, an act which is required by the law. Thus it appears that the world's wealthiest country, which has spent hundreds of thousands of dollars on this case, is too poor to spend an amount of money which will perhaps not exceed $25,000 to protect its citizens from acts that have been declared inimical to the best interests of its people. Another representative of the commission, asked at another time, stated that the commission, in order to reduce the cost of the printing of the record, has asked the defendant to stipulate the waiving of the printing of part of the record. Such a request could, of course, have been made only by children and not by mature persons, for is it possible for any rational person to believe that a defendant who has nothing to gain, but everything to lose, will ever give up any of its rights under the law?

We can only speculate as to the reason for this queer performance. Will H. Hays, president of Motion Picture Producers & Distributors of America, and his chief assistant come from Indiana. Martin Morrison was an Indiana Congressman. Commissioner Humphrey, though appointed from Washington, is a native of Indiana and began his career in that State.

There is enough evidence in this combination of circumstances to justify every one of you writing to your Senator demanding that he use his influence to have this strange case cleared up before Commissioner Humphrey, whose term is about to expire, is reappointed as a member of the Federal Trade Commission.

If you should write to your Senator, send me a copy of the letter. My reason for making such a request of you is to keep informed as to who has failed to write a letter so as to urge him to do so without delay.

Mr. BROOKHART. The publisher of this paper makes no such intimations in reference to the Department of Justice, nor do I; but it should be recorded that proceedings against the Motion-Picture Trust appear to proceed more slowly than any other class of litigation. The report of the Attorney General shows that a suit was brought in Chicago on December 15, 1928, against Balaban & Katz, a subsidiary of Paramount-Publix, and the several producers, charging a combination to squeeze the independent exhibitors by means of protection schedules and long-term contracts, but that no further action was taken. The same report shows that on November 27, 1929, a suit was filed against the Fox Film Corporation and others under the Clayton Act to segregate the Fox, Loew, and Metro-Goldwyn-Meyer interests; that an interlocutory decree trusteeing some of the securities was entered, but that no further action was taken. Also that on the same date a similar suit was filed to divest Warner Brothers of the stock of First National Pictures Corporation, and that no further steps were taken. As regards this latter case, I learn from the trade press that since the institution of the case, and without any intervention on the part of the court, the companies were allowed to complete the consolidation by a physical merger of the properties.

MORE DARK CORNERS TO EXPLORE

Among the first securities to display weakness and therefore to contribute to the stock-market debacle were those issued by the motion-picture companies in a wild orgy of expansion prior to and during 1929. I called the attention of the Senate to this program of expansion in May, 1929. Theaters were built without regard to the seating requirements of the communities affected and on a scale of reckless extravagance that eclipsed the records of the consolidation era from 1880 to 1904. Securities were issued to and absorbed by the public in bales, and the amount of water represented by these securities would have floated the United States Navy. Not only was there a flood of water, but much of the money actually invested in properties was so recklessly and extravagantly spent as to contribute little or nothing to the earning power of the enterprises.

A curious demonstration of this is found in one of the large eastern cities where the city authorities have licensed theaters to operate on Sunday provided a certain percentage of the net receipts is dedicated to certain designated uses. The theaters of one of the great chains were making such meager returns to this charitable fund that the authorities investigated the matter. It was discovered that the management was charging against receipts amounts for depreciation of flamboyant gold-leaf decorations which virtually deprived the charities in question of any benefit from the Sunday performances.

Little or no thought was given to the earning power of the houses built and acquired in view of the heavy investments represented thereby. As a result great numbers of these houses are now dark. In addition, the producers, in seeking to give their houses a competitive advantage over the independent theaters, drove so many of the latter out of business that the market for film was seriously curtailed. According to a recent writer, the five big chains were seeking to emulate the Chinese in the walled city who sought to get rich by doing each other's laundry.

Now that the bubble has burst the insiders have been planning ways and means to cancel the claims of the trusting investors of the golden era and to retain the properties discharged of these claims. The Senator from Washington [Mr. DILL] has a resolution to investigate the methods by which the Radio-Keith-Orpheum Corporation was recently refinanced. My understanding is that as a result of that transaction the Radio Corporation of America greatly increased its control of the moving-picture subsidiary and that many individual stockholders who were unable to meet the assessments were closed out.

I earnestly hope that the Senator will join me in pressing for the broader inquiry, as I am convinced that, unless steps are taken, we will witness the greatest shaking down of small investors in all history.

Also I would like to see a full disclosure of the relations between the motion-picture producers, on the one hand, and the manufacturers of electrical equipment for reproducing sound in theaters, the principal music-publishing houses (together with their agent, the American Society of Composers, Authors, and Publishers), and the manufacturers of so-called screen trailers, on the other hand. The relations between the producers and the electrical manufacturers, Radio Corporation of America and the Western Electric Co., are important because under the license agreements between these interests royalties are provided for the recording of sound, which royalties are passed on to the theater owners as a "score charge," i. e., a charge over and above the rental for the film. In addition, the electric companies pay a royalty to the American Society of Composers, Authors, and Publishers for the right to record copyrighted music, which royalty amounts to so much for each seat in every theater in which the recorded music is reproduced.

The producers, who, I am informed, have large interests in the music-publishing houses, require by their contracts that the theater owners take out a license from the agent of those houses, the American Society of Composers, Authors, and Publishers, under which they also pay a royalty to the society, which is fixed at so much per seat. Thus the poor exhibitor must pay three charges—that is, film rental, score charge, and music tax for the right to run the films in his theater, and I strongly suspect these triple charges go to line the pockets of substantially the same interests.

I also desire that light be shed on the operations of an organization claimed to be separate from, but actually operated within, the Hays organization known as the Copyright Protection Bureau. This bureau, headed by Gabriel Hess, who is also general attorney for the Hays organization, is in reality another instrumentality whereby and through which the producers of motion pictures conspire to oppress the independent theater owners. The business of this organization is to maintain a sort of espionage over the independent theater owners to detect possible violations of contracts through the holding over of pictures beyond the time provided in such contracts. When such violations are detected the victim is threatened with prosecution, not for the mere contract violation but for infringement of copyright, and he is compelled to settle on the basis of the liquidated damages provided in the copyright law and not on the basis of actual damage inflicted.

Let us take an example of the extreme hardship inflicted on the theater owners in this way. I have here and will send to the Interstate Commerce Committee copy of a letter from a theater owner in Ohio. He recites that the salesman for one of the producers asked more for some pictures than he thought he could pay. The salesman thereupon suggested that he buy the news reel for one day and play it for three in order to reduce the total rental by that much. The theater owner followed the suggestion in good faith, and with the knowledge of the local exchange, for a considerable period. The withholding of the film inflicted no loss on the producer, since there was no complaint that it conflicted with commitments to any subsequent-run theater. Nevertheless the theater owner was mulcted in damages under the statutory provision.

This is one instance out of a great number that have figured in recent complaints, and I am sure the committee, in conducting an investigation under this resolution, will not lack for volunteer witnesses on this point. It is important, however, that the nature of the arrangement between the several supposedly competing producers and this bureau be brought to light, as well as the disposition of the sums annually extorted from the theater owners in this way. I believe it will be found to be not so much a measure for protecting copyrights as a means for oppressing the independent exhibitors, and that it will be found that the bureau has been more active and exacting in territory where the exhibitors have shown some independence than in more servile territory.

THOROUGH INQUIRY NEEDED

That the inquiry called for by my resolution is needed is attested by the hundreds of letters, petitions, and resolutions that have been received by me. The bill to abolish block booking which I introduced a few years ago, and which I shall reintroduce in modified form, has been indorsed by parent-teacher associations, women's clubs, church organizations, welfare organiaztions, and independent-exhibitor organizations everywhere. The only organizations that have failed to indorse the measure are those to whom its meaning had been utterly misstated by representatives of the trust. These representatives, in an effort to embarrass me, got a few theater owners in Iowa to disapprove the bill on the understanding that under its provisions they would be fined if they bought more than one picture at a time. I am glad to say that this has been corrected and that Iowa now has a really independent organization in which no such skullduggery could be practiced.

I firmly believe that if a searching investigation of the motion-picture industry is made it will equal in importance to the public and in the startling nature of its revelations such great undertakings as the Stanley steel investigation, the Pujo money-trust investigation, and the Teapot Dome investigation.

The successful conduct of this investigation calls for capable assistance to the end that the evidence may be carefully worked up and adequately presented. I know from experience in connection with hearings on my bill that merely calling in the representatives of the trust to answer questions will not result in a triumph of truth.

Such an inquiry in the long run will greatly benefit the motion-picture industry, just as it will benefit the public. Many new interests are coming into the industry who do not know—and if left to Hays will never know—what is going on. I believe that when they get a picture of conditions they will turn their thumbs down on the Hays policy of attempting to "fix" violations of decency instead of preventing them, that they will see that competition in the business is kept decent and is not conducted in violation of the antitrust laws, that they will see the wisdom of dissolving their chains of theaters and leaving the field of exhibition to the independent operators with their knowledge of public tastes and their local good will, and that they will restore prosperity to the great producing organizations by restricting them to their legitimate function of making wholesome pictures for the entertainment of the people.

Mr. President, in connection with this address I desire to introduce a bill and to have it printed in the RECORD following the address.

I also desire to offer a resolution of investigation, and ask that it also be printed in the RECORD following the bill.

The bill (S. 3770) to prevent the obstruction of and burdens upon interstate trade and commerce in copyrighted motion-picture films, and to prevent restraint upon free competition in the production, distribution, and exhibition of copyrighted motion-picture films (a) by prohibiting the compulsory block booking of copyrighted motion-picture films; (b) by making unlawful unreasonable and discriminatory protection in favor of certain theaters over others; (c) to compel the furnishing of accurate synopses of all pictures offered to theater operators before the same have been released and reviewed; and (d) to amend section 2 of the Clayton Act to make it apply to license agreements and leases as well as sales in interstate commerce was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A bill (S. 3770) to prevent the obstruction of and burdens upon interstate trade and commerce in copyrighted motion-picture films and to prevent restraint upon free competition in the production, distribution, and exhibition of copyrighted motion-picture films (a) by prohibiting the compulsory block booking of copyrighted motion-picture films; (b) by making unlawful unreasonable and discriminatory protection in favor of certain theaters over others; (c) to compel the furnishing of accurate synopses of all pictures offered to theater operators before the same have been released and reviewed; and (d) to amend section 2 of the Clayton Act to make it apply to license agreements and leases as well as sales in interstate commerce

Be it enacted, etc., That six months after the date of the approval of this act it shall be unlawful for any producer or distributor of copyrighted motion-picture films engaged in transporting, leasing, or licensing such films in the current of interstate commerce, and having and offering for lease or license blocks or groups of films containing two or more photoplays or subjects, to insist that a licensee or lessee shall take all or a designated number of such photoplays or subjects out of the total number offered in order to obtain the ones which the lessee or licensee desires or to refuse to lease or license such lesser number of photoplays or subjects out of the total number offered as the lessee or licensee desires, the purpose and intent of this section being to make unlawful the practice of compulsory block booking as known and practiced in the motion-picture industry and to confer on the operators of motion-picture theaters the right to lease and exhibit only such pictures as in their judgment will be acceptable to their patrons.

SEC. 2. Six months after the date of the approval of this act it shall be unlawful for two or more producers or distributors of copyrighted motion pictures, in the current of interstate commerce, acting jointly or in concert with one another, or with any theater or chain of theaters, to agree upon or observe any plan or schedule of zoning or protection, or to observe any policy, which results in withholding such copyrighted motion-picture films for an unreasonable time from any theater or class of theaters after the same have been exhibited in any other theater or class of theaters, or which gives to any theater or class of theaters an unfair competitive advantage over any other theater or class of theaters not warranted by competitive conditions in the territory where such theaters are located, or which subjects any theater or class of theaters to an unfair disadvantage or unjust discrimination in the matter of obtaining copyrighted motion-picture films.

SEC. 3. Administration of sections 1 and 2 of this act is vested in the Federal Trade Commission, which is hereby authorized and empowered to make suitable rules and regulations and to hold hearings and enter orders for the purpose of giving effect to the provisions of those sections. Disagreements between the producers and distributors of copyrighted motion-picture films, on the one hand, and operators of motion-picture theaters, on the other hand, concerning the proportionate part of the total rental asked for a block or group of pictures which shall be demanded and paid for such lesser number as the theater owner may elect to take, as provided in section 1, shall be settled by the Federal Trade Commission after full hearing. Any order entered by the commission shall be binding on the parties in case a contract or lease is entered into, provided the party in whose favor such order is entered shall give bond in such amount and with such security as the commission shall provide, to protect the rights of the other party in case the decision of the commission is modified or reversed on appeal. Disputes arising between the producers and distributors of copyrighted motion pictures, on the one hand, and any theater or class of theaters on the other, or between different classes of theaters, regarding the reasonableness of the protection given any theater or class of theaters, and all complaints of unreasonable and discriminatory protection made unlawful by section 2 shall also be settled by the commission. The procedure of the commission shall conform as nearly as may be to that prescribed in section 5 of the Federal Trade Commission act, and orders of the commission may be contested and/or enforced as provided therein.

SEC. 4. Six months after the date of the approval of this act it shall be unlawful for any producer or distributor of copyrighted motion-picture films to lease or license, or offer to lease or license, in the course of interstate commerce any such films containing photoplays or other subjects of 4,000 feet or more in length, to the operator of any theater or theaters for exhibition to the public, unless such producer or distributor shall furnish or make available to such theater operator, at or before the time any such lease or license agreement is entered into, a full and complete synopsis or outline of the story, incidents, and scenes depicted in said films. The synopsis of any such film of 4,000 feet or over shall contain at least 1,000 words and shall afford the theater operator sufficient information concerning the subject matter of the film to determine whether the same is suitable for exhibition to his patrons. Failure to furnish such synopsis or outline, and any knowing or wilfull misstatement as to the story or incidents of the picture outlined in any such synopsis, shall be punished by a fine of not more than $1,000 and not less than $100 for each offense, in the discretion of the court.

SEC. 5. That section 2 of the Clayton Act be, and it is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 2. That it shall be unlawful for any person engaged in commerce, in the course of such commerce, either directly or indirectly, to discriminate in price, rentals, or royalties between different purchasers, lessees, or licensees of commodities, whether patented or unpatented, copyrighted or uncopyrighted, which commodities are sold, leased, or licensed for use, consumption, resale, or exhibition within the United States or any Territory thereof or the District of Columbia or any insular possession or other place under the jurisdiction of the United States where the effect of such discrimination may be to substantially lessen competition or tend to create a monopoly in any line of commerce: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall prevent discrimination in price, rentals, or royalties between purchasers, lessees, and licensees of commodities on account of differences in the grade, quality, or quantity of the commodity sold, leased, or licensed or that makes only due allowance for difference in the cost of selling, leasing, or transportation, or discrimination in price, rental, or royalty in the same or different communities made in good faith to meet competition: And provided further, That nothing herein contained shall prevent persons engaged in selling, leasing, and licensing goods, wares, or merchandise in commerce from selecting their own customers, lessees, and licensees in bona fide transactions and not in restraint of trade."

The resolution (S. Res. 170) was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce, as follows:

Whereas the transportation, distribution, and licensing of motion-picture films and accessories as commonly practiced have been held to constitute interstate trade and commerce; and

Whereas it has been alleged that the business of producing, distributing, and exhibiting motion pictures is carried on by various corporations and individuals in violation of the antitrust laws; and

Whereas it has been alleged that the motion-picture industry has made no bona fide effort to censor screen material and is producing, releasing, and exhibiting many pictures that are indecent and otherwise unfit for public display; and

Whereas it has been alleged that the Motion Picture Producers & Distributors of America (Inc.), of which Mr. Will Hays is president, is primarily a political organization and has exercised undue influence with private, State, and Federal agencies in matters affecting the motion-picture industry; and

Whereas petitions have been received from various persons, organizations, and publications asking that the motion-picture industry be investigated and proposing legislation to remedy alleged abuses in the motion-picture business: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Committee on Interstate Commerce be, and it is hereby, empowered and directed forthwith to make a sweeping and thorough investigation of the organization, financing, and practices of the motion-picture industry in the United States, and particularly to investigate and report on the following:

1. The organization, functions, and financing of the Motion Picture Producers & Distributors of America (Inc.), the purposes and accomplishments of said organization, and the extent to which the members thereof have cooperated through said agency to suppress competition and restrain trade.

2. The activities of the members of said Motion Picture Producers & Distributors of America to monopolize or control said industry by such devices as uniform sales contracts, compulsory arbitration, withholding of product from independent theaters, allocation of product to controlled theaters, unfair and unreasonable zoning and protection, block booking, and other unfair practices.

3. The efforts of the theater-owning producers to regulate the admission prices of independent theaters by limitations in so-called percentage contracts and by withholding film for unreasonable periods from low-admission houses.

4. The degree of diligence shown by the Department of Justice and the Federal Trade Commission in prosecuting alleged violations of the antitrust laws by motion-picture companies and the reasons for the delay in pressing pending cases; and, if there has been lack of diligence, whether it is the result of the activities of Mr. Will Hays, or the Motion Picture Producers & Distributors of America.

5. The capitalization of the larger companies in the motion-picture industry and the methods by which they were financed, particularly during the past six years, and the reasons for the great shrinkage in the value of their securities in the hands of the public.

6. The relations—corporate, contractual, and otherwise—between the producers and distributors of motion pictures, on the one hand, and the manufacturers of electrical equipment for reproducing sound in theaters, the principal music-publishing houses, and the manufacturers of so-called screen trailers, on the other hand, and the effect of such relations on the independent theater owners and the public.

7. The organization and operation of the so-called copyright protection bureau and the connection between said bureau and the Motion Picture Producers & Distributors of America, and the truth of the assertion that said bureau under color of the copyright law has extorted penalties from theater owners which bear no relation to actual damages resulting from alleged infringements.

8. The facts in reference to the so-called Hays Morality Code, whether it was promulgated in a bona fide effort to improve conditions on the screen or whether it was intended as a mere blind to silence criticism, the extent to which it has been obeyed or evaded; and, if it has been obeyed, whether it is adequate to protect the public from indecent and obnoxious pictures.

9. The efforts of the Motion Picture Producers & Distributors of America to influence public opinion in favor of the industry and to silence criticism by propaganda, by the employment or subsidizing members or employees of various national organizations, and by efforts to control the action of such organizations.

10. The activities of the Motion Picture Producers & Distributors of America in attempting to control and direct organizations of theater owners to subsidize those that conform to the Hays policies, and to interfere with the financing and operation of those that do not.

11. The effect on the independent theater owners and on the public of percentage playing, as now required by the larger producing companies, and particularly of so-called selective percentage playing under which the producer designates the days on which its pictures must be played: Be it further

Resolved, That the Committee on Interstate Commerce inform the Senate fully as to any changes in the antitrust laws, the copyright laws, the laws against using the mails to defraud, and any new measures which may be necessary or desirable to cure any abuses which may be found to exist in the organization, financing, and practices of the motion-picture industry: And be it further

Resolved, That the Committee on Interstate Commerce, in the discharge of its duty under this resolution, be and it is hereby, authorized to employ such attorneys and investigators as it may deem necessary fully to comply with this resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-seven Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, it is not my intention to-day to go into an exhaustive consideration of the bill. At a later time, probably several times while the bill is before the Senate and under discussion, I shall go into more detail. At the present time I desire only to review as briefly as I can some of the leading questions that are involved in the proposed legislation. I therefore ask that I be allowed to proceed without interruption. At the conclusion of my analysis and likewise during the remainder of the debate on the measure, I shall be very glad indeed to yield at any time and to answer any questions that I am able to answer.

Mr. President, the writ of injunction is always a harsh remedy. It is one which should never be resorted to except in cases where irreparable injury will result unless a restraining hand is put forth to prevent it. It should never be issued except in cases where the law will afford no relief. It is a remedy having application only to property rights. Whenever it is used to deny the fundamental rights and privileges of free citizens, it becomes tyrannous and oppressive.

The cruelty of the injunction has been especially apparent in disputes between labor and capital, and it has often occurred in such cases that the real object of the injunction is not to protect property but to restrain the constitutional rights of individuals and thus to interfere with human liberty. Its use in labor disputes has been a gradual growth, coincident with the gradual growth of immense combinations of wealth. As monopoly has increased its hold upon great business undertakings and operations, and as combinations of great wealth have been formed for the financial enrichment of those engaged in the monopoly, the power thus attained for its own enrichment has often been used to take away the freedom of laboring men who are compelled to toil for the support of themselves and those dependent upon them.

The ordinary laboring man is powerless to cope with such combinations, and he must accept employment upon the terms which monopoly offers or become a subject of charity and see his family and those immediately dependent upon him deprived of the ordinary comforts of life.

LABOR UNIONS

To prevent this result laboring men have organized into associations and unions in order that they may present a united front to the demands of combined wealth and great aggregations of capital. His right to do this has become universally recognized, but, by means of harsh, cruel, and misused injunctive process, monopoly, through the assistance of our courts, has interfered by means of injunctions, which, in their effect, have often taken away the real right of labor to have a voice in the wage it shall receive, and the effect has often been involuntary servitude on the part of those who must toil in order that they and their families may live. Such conditions bring about involuntary servitude—a species of economic slavery—which can not permanently exist in a free country; and such economic slavery is as cruel, as merciless, and as effective as slavery based upon the color of the human skin. The man who, by force of economic conditions, is compelled to toil against his wish and under conditions depriving him of his freedom, is a slave even though his skin may be white.

The tyranny of some of these injunctions, as I shall hereafter point out, has taken away the freedom and the liberty of many of our citizens as completely and as tyrannically as ever occurred in days when slavery was recognized by the Constitution.

BOTH OF THE GREAT POLITICAL PARTIES HAVE PROMISED RELIEF

The hardship and the injustice brought about by the issuing of injunctions by Federal judges in labor disputes have been the subject of discussion for a number of years. The evils arising from such injunctions have been universally recognized. A public sentiment for relief through these years has gradually grown until the universal opinion of the patriotic people has crystallized into a demand for legislative relief.

Both of the great political parties in their last national conventions took a definite stand in favor of the passage of legislation by Congress which would give relief to the evils and the wrongs brought about by the issuing of injunctions in labor disputes. The Republican National Convention at Kansas City adopted a plank on the subject as follows:

> The party favors freedom in wage contracts, the right of collective bargaining by free and responsible agents of their own choosing, which develops and maintains that purposeful cooperation which gains its chief incentive through voluntary agreement.
> We believe that injunctions in labor disputes have in some instances been abused and have given rise to a serious question for legislation

The Democratic National Convention, a short time thereafter, at Houston, Tex., spoke as follows:

> (a) We favor the principle of collective bargaining and the democratic principle that organized labor should choose its own representatives without coercion or interference.
> (b) Labor is not a commodity. Human rights must be safeguarded. Labor should be exempt from the operation of antitrust laws.
> (c) We recognize that legislative and other investigations have shown the existence of grave abuse in the issuance of injunctions in labor disputes. No injunctions should be granted in labor disputes except upon proof of threatened irreparable injury and after notice and hearing, and the injunction should be confined to those acts which do directly threaten irreparable injury. The expressed purpose of representatives of capital, labor, and the bar to devise a plan for the elimination of the present evils with respect to injunctions must be supported and legislation designed to accomplish these ends formulated and passed.

It therefore becomes a nonpartisan question, or rather a party question agreed to by both of the dominant political parties.

Must we assume that these great political parties are not in earnest? Were they attempting to deceive the people of the United States when they proclaimed these two planks upon this important question? And are they now, on the eve of another great national campaign, admitting that they were not sincere and were only trying to get votes at the general election?

I do not want to indulge in any such assumptions. I would rather go on the theory that both of these great political parties were honestly laying down propositions in which they believed, and which, if granted the power by the people, they would enact into law.

We ought to remember, also, that this is the only anti-injunction bill which has been proposed. If it is claimed that this bill is not correct and that those in power want to redeem the promise thus publicly made, then why are we not presented with some substitute? Why have we not been presented long before this with legislation on the subject?

I can not close my eyes to the fact that the party which won that election and which, until just a few months ago, was in complete control of both branches of the National Legislature and the executive departments has made no effort so far as I know to redeem this platform pledge.

This proposed legislation has not had the assistance of the present administration; but, on the other hand, it is fair to say that in general the opposition to this legislation has come from those who are recognized as being closely allied with the present administration.

A PUBLIC POLICY

This bill starts out by declaring a public policy of the United States in relation to labor disputes. This is the first time in the history of the United States that any attempt has been made to declare, through an act of Congress, the public policy of the United States in relation to the issuing of injunctions in labor controversies. The object of setting up such a policy is to assist the courts in the proper interpretation of the proposed legislation. Such a legislative procedure, so far as labor disputes are concerned, will be of great assistance whenever the proposed law or any part of it comes up for review and consideration by a court and will relieve the question of many of the difficulties which have heretofore existed when a court has been called upon to interpret the law. It will, I am sure, go far toward brushing aside any question of the constitutionality of the act or any part of it.

Section 1 of the bill under consideration declares:

> That no court of the United States, as herein defined, shall have jurisdiction to issue any restraining order or temporary or permanent injunction in a case involving or growing out of a labor dispute, except in strict conformity with the provisions of this act, nor shall any such restraining order or temporary or permanent injunction be issued contrary to the public policy declared in this act.

This section is really a preamble to the public policy declared in section 2, which reads as follows:

> In the interpretation of this act and in determining the jurisdiction and authority of the courts of the United States, as such jurisdiction and authority are herein defined and limited, the public policy of the United States is hereby declared as follows:
> "Whereas under prevailing economic conditions, developed with the aid of governmental authority for owners of property to organize in the corporate and other forms of ownership association, the individual unorganized worker is commonly helpless to exercise actual liberty of contract and to protect his freedom of labor, and thereby to obtain acceptable terms and conditions of employment, wherefore, though he should be free to decline to associate with his fellows, it is necessary that he have full freedom of association, self-organization, and designation of representatives of his own choosing, to negotiate the terms and conditions of his employment, and that he shall be free from the interference, restraint, or coercion of employers of labor, or their agents in the designation of such representatives or in self-organization or in other concerted activities for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection; therefore the following definitions of, and limitations upon, the jurisdiction and authority of the courts of the United States are hereby enacted."

If the act or any part of it should be involved in any litigation where an injunction was issued or asked for, the judge before whom such action was pending would be required to give full force and effect to the public policy thus declared by the act; and, having in mind the public policy thus declared, he would be able to so construe the various provisions of the act as to give full effect and validity to the public policy thus declared.

There is no doubt whatever but that the Congress has the constitutional right to declare the public policy of the United States upon any question upon which the Congress has the right to legislate; and when such public policy is declared, it becomes the duty of all the courts to give effect to such policy and to carry it out in the enforcement of any law where such public policy has application.

Where Congress has not declared a public policy, it is within the province of the court to decide what the public policy is; but when such public policy has been declared by Congress, it is the duty of the court to follow such policy and to decide litigated questions related thereto in accordance with the policy thus declared by Congress. This doctrine has been repeatedly upheld by both State and Federal courts. In the case of People v. City of Chicago (321 Ill. 466–475) the Supreme Court of Illinois said:

> The public policy of a State is to be found embodied in its constitution, its statutes, and, when these are silent on the subject, in the decisions of its courts. The public policy of the State, when not fixed by the constitution, is not unalterable, but varies upon any given question with changing legislation thereon, and any action which, in the absence of legislation thereon, by the decisions of the courts has been held contrary to the public policy of the State, is no longer contrary to such public policy when such action is expressly authorized by legislative enactment.

Another case decided by the Supreme Court of the State of Illinois directly on the point was the case of Union Trust & Savings Bank v. Telephone Co. (258 Ill. 202). In that case the court said:

> While no statute has been enacted declaring such exclusive contracts criminal or giving a right of action to persons prejudiced by them, the courts have declared the public policy of the State, in accordance with the common law, to be opposed to such contracts which tend to put the power to render public service in the hands of one corporation and to take it away from all others. The legislature has the power to change this policy. It is a legislative question whether the public interest will be promoted by monopolistic rather than competitive service.

The Supreme Court of the United States has several times upheld this doctrine. In the case of McCulloch v. Maryland (4 Wheat. (U. S.) 315, 423), the court, speaking through Chief Justice Marshall, said:

> Where the law is * * * calculated to affect any of the objects intrusted to the Government, to undertake here to inquire into the degree of its necessity would be to pass the line which circumscribes the judicial department and to tread on legislative ground.

Again, in the case of Michaelson v. United States (266 U. S. 42, 68), the Supreme Court expressly upheld the right of Congress to declare the public policy of the United States, in the following declaration:

> The words of the act are plain and in terms inclusive of all classes of employment, and we find nothing in them which requires a resort to judicial construction. The reasoning of the court below really does not present a question of statutory construction but rather an argument justifying the suppositious exemption on the ground of necessity or of policy—

Note the words, " or of policy "— > a matter addressed to the legislative and not the judicial authority.

In the passage of the existing railway labor act Congress has already established a precedent of proclaiming a public policy by legislative enactment. In the third paragraph of section 2 of that act it is provided:

> Representatives, for the purposes of this act, shall be designated by the respective parties in such manner as may be provided in their corporate organization or unincorporated association, or by other means of collective action, without interference, influence, or coercion exercised by either party over the self-organization or designation of representatives by the other. (Par. 3, sec. 152, title 45, U. S. C. A., 1929 sup.)

In effect, this declaration of public policy in regard to railway employees is the same as the declaration of public policy in the present bill in regard to all employees. The constitutionality of the railway labor act has been sustained by the Supreme Court in Texas & New Orleans Railroad Co. v. Brotherhood of Railroad and Steamship Clerks, decided May 26, 1930 (281 U. S. 548). In that case the Supreme Court, through Chief Justice Hughes, declared:

> Evidence in this case supports the conclusion of the courts below that the defendant railroad company and its officers were actually engaged in promoting the organization of an association of its clerical employees in the interest of the company and in opposition to the plaintiff labor organization, and that these activities constituted an actual interference with the liberty of the clerical employees in the selection of representatives for the purposes set forth in the railway labor act of May 20, 1926.

Further on the Chief Justice said:

The railway labor act of 1926, while elaborating a plan for amicable adjustments and voluntary arbitration of disputes between common carriers and their employees, imposed certain definite obligations enforceable by judicial proceedings, one of which is found in the provision of subdivision 3 of section 2, that "representatives, for the purposes of this act, shall be designated by the respective parties * * * without interference, influence, or coercion exercised by either party over the self-organization or designation of representatives by the other."

Further on in that case, on page 570, the Supreme Court said:

Congress was not required to ignore this right of the employees but could safeguard it and seek to make their appropriate collective action an instrument of peace rather than of strife. Such collective action would be a mockery if representation were made futile by interferences with freedom of choice. Thus the prohibition by Congress of interference with the selection of representatives for the purpose of negotiation and conference between employers and employees, instead of being an invasion of the constitutional right of either, was based on the recognition of the rights of both.

In the case of Dayton-Goose Creek Railway v. United States (263 U. S. 456), the opinion of the court shows that the act was interpreted and was sustained upon the grounds of a public policy declared by Congress. The court in that case said:

The new act seeks affirmatively to build up a system of railways prepared to handle promptly all the interstate traffic of the country. * * * To achieve this great purpose it puts the railroad systems of the country more completely than ever under the fostering guardianship and control of the commission.

Title IV of the transportation act, embracing paragraphs 418 and 422, is carefully framed to achieve its expressly declared objects.

As I have before stated, the public policy of the United States in labor disputes, having been thus declared by the Congress, acting under its constitutional right to make such a declaration, it will become the duty of the courts to construe the act and to enforce it with a view of giving effect to the carrying out of the public policy thus declared.

THE "YELLOW-DOG" CONTRACT

In a great many of the injunctions which the courts have issued in labor disputes the basis for the injunction was a written contract of employment, signed by the employee when he accepted employment. This contract has become almost universally known as the "yellow-dog" contract. It requires the employee, as a condition of obtaining employment, to agree that he will not join a union while he is in the employment, or, that if he is then a member of a union, he will disassociate himself from it; that he recognizes the right of the employer to discharge him without notice; that he will not quit his employment without giving sufficient notice to his employer to enable him to hire some one to take his place. The employee in most of these contracts agrees in advance to accept such conditions of labor, hours of labor, and so forth, as may from time to time be decided upon by the employer. Not all of these contracts are the same. Other and similar conditions from those noted are sometimes added, but, in a general way, they all have the same effect. They take away from the laboring man the right to have anything to say about any of the conditions connected with his employment. The hours of labor, conditions under which the labor is to be performed, the right of the laborer to quit employment whenever he becomes dissatisfied, the amount of pay which he shall receive, the right of the employer to reduce the pay at any time without notice, and so forth—all these things are turned over entirely and solely to the corporation or individual owning or operating the business. The employee waives his right absolutely to free association and fair representation in connection with his wages, the hours of labor, and any other conditions of employment. In other words, he surrenders his actual liberty of contract and to a great extent enters into voluntary servitude.

I know it can be said, and always is said, that the man seeking work does not have to sign this contract; that he does not have to work under the conditions named in the contract, because he has the right to refuse to enter into any employment contrary to what he believes to be right.

But all this, as a practical proposition, is no defense whatever. If the man applying for labor refuses to sign this contract, he can go on to some other corporation doing the same kind of business and apply for a job. But when he does, he will be confronted with the same "yellow-dog" contract. As he goes from place to place in his attempt to get work in his chosen field, he will always be presented with the same conditions. For instance, if the man hunting a job is a coal miner, he presents himself at the office of the corporation, asks for a job, and he is at once presented with the "yellow-dog" contract and told to sign on the dotted line. If he declines to sign and goes to the next coal mine, he is presented with the same contract, and so on throughout the entire coal field.

The result is that by the combination of large corporations in a particular line of business, the laboring man must accept unconditionally the terms laid down by the employer. He is absolutely helpless under such contracts. His family can not have food to eat or clothes to wear unless he gets a job. If he gets a job, he must surrender his liberty. He must, for the time being, become a slave. He can not associate with his fellows. In connection with his fellows, he can not present a grievance to the employer. He has agreed to make no such demand. If conditions become unbearable, his only remedy is to go alone and face the big combination of perhaps millions of wealth. He must singly present any grievance he has. He must abide by the decision which is thus given him. He has no appeal. He has no opportunity to join with his fellows and make his demands effective. In effect, if he must live and support his family and clothe his children, he must surrender his liberty.

These conditions have grown up because of the combinations of great aggregations of wealth. The poor man, standing alone, is absolutely helpless. This bill declares that such contracts are—

* * * contrary to the public policy of the United States, shall not be enforceable and shall not afford any basis for the granting of legal or equitable relief by any court of the United States.

Many of the injunctions which have been issued in the past in labor disputes have been based wholly, or in a large part, upon such contracts, and upon the assumption that they are valid.

As I have briefly outlined, this bill sets up a public policy. One of the objects of this proposed legislation is to outlaw this unconscionable and indefensible contract; and some action by Congress in this respect is absolutely necessary, because, as I have said, many labor injunctions have been sustained on the theory that such contracts are legal.

In my own humble judgment, it does not seem to me that any legislation ought to be necessary. It seems clear to me that as a matter of common law, without any statute being necessary, such contracts instead of being enforced ought to have been declared null and void by our courts. Such a contract, in my judgment, should be held void—

First. As being contrary to public policy under the common law. If these contracts are sustained, then no labor organization can exist, and laboring men will be compelled to submit unconditionally to any terms laid down by the employer. If men must agree in advance to surrender any liberty of contract in order to obtain employment, they are under coercion of necessity forced into working under conditions of involuntary servitude.

Second. These contracts should have been held void because they are entered into without consideration. The employer, on the one hand, has his work which he wants done. The laborer, on the other hand, as a consideration for his part of the contract, undertakes to perform the work. The employer gives up none of his freedom and action, and furnishes no consideration for the promise of the employee that he will surrender his ordinary rights of "liberty of contract," which are inherent in every free citizen.

Third. Such contracts should have been held void because they are signed under duress and coercion. The employee, as I have said, is forced to accept all of the burdensome and unreasonable and sometimes inhuman conditions imposed upon him in order to support himself and family. Nevertheless, since the courts have sometimes enforced those contracts and issued unmerciful injunctions on the theory of the legality of such contracts, it is necessary that Congress take some action; and this bill has for one of its main objects the outlawing of and the doing away with such contracts.

It must be remembered that up to this time we have had no statute declaring any public policy on the subject, and have had no statute which attempts to outlaw such contracts as these. There is no doubt in my mind but that courts ought to and will follow the declaration of Congress and absolutely refuse to enforce any such contract if this bill becomes a law.

In the case of Bailey v. Alabama (219 U. S. 219) the Supreme Court said that one of the objects of the thirteenth amendment was—> * * * to make labor free by prohibiting that control by which the personal service of one man is disposed of or coerced for another's benefit, which is the essence of involuntary servitude.

In the same case the court said:

> There is no more important concern than to safeguard the freedom of labor upon which alone can enduring prosperity be based.

This case was decided by a divided court, two Justices dissenting. Those opposing this legislation dwell with a great deal of assurance upon the dissenting opinion in that case, written by Justice Holmes. But a careful reading of Justice Holmes's dissenting opinion will convince any fair-minded man that there will be no conflict between the dissenting opinion of Justice Holmes and this bill now before the Senate. The Bailey case was based upon an Alabama statute, and Justice Holmes in his dissenting opinion assumed that the contract under this statute was a legal one because it was made in accordance with the statute which he believed to be constitutional, and that, therefore, a man could be legally punished for obtaining money by making such a contract with the fraudulent intention of breaking it. He met the argument that the terms of such contract would result in peonage with the pertinent comment: "If the contract is one that ought not to be made, prohibit it." In other words, a fair conclusion from the dissenting opinion of Justice Holmes will convince anyone that the legislative power had the right to prohibit the very contract in dispute.

That is what we are trying to do in this bill—to declare by statute a public policy of the United States; that the "yellow-dog" contract is in conflict with such public policy and that, therefore, it shall not be enforced in any Federal court in the United States.

No attempt will be made to defend the "yellow-dog" contract. Its inhumanity will be admitted by those who oppose this bill. But, they will say, it is a wrong which can not be remedied under our Constitution, and therefore that such contracts must be upheld by the courts, with all their evil consequences.

The evils which this bill attempts to remedy, especially in respect to the "yellow-dog" contracts, are admitted. They will not be denied in the course of this debate and most of those who oppose the bill will frankly admit not only that the "yellow-dog" contracts which this bill outlaws are in existence but that some method of relief in behalf of suffering humanity ought to be devised. Yet it will be claimed that the bill under consideration is unconstitutional for the very reason that it does outlaw these inhuman and barbarous contracts.

It will be said, also, that during the last three or four years, in which the remedies proposed in this bill have been under consideration and discussion, those who have continually fought the legislation and are still opposing it have so far made no attempt themselves to report any bill or to suggest any remedy for the evil which they admit exists.

By the abolition of these unconscionable contracts this bill sets on the hilltop a beacon of human liberty. It gives to those who toil, to those who are poor, to those who by the sweat of their faces contribute to the happiness of humble homes the enjoyment of that freedom and that liberty which is necessary in every free country for all of its citizens and not by one class of its people. It gives liberty to the downtrodden and the poor, and in this respect puts them on an equality with those who live in luxury and plenty.

Human liberty after all is just as precious to the man who toils in the darkness of the bottomless mine as it is to the man who controls a nation or who owns unlimited wealth. It gives hope to the little children of those who have no hope if liberty is blotted out. It brings joy and peace to the humble fireside in the weather-beaten cottage. It fills the breast with pride and with love of country and of all mankind. Let me quote one of the most beautiful tributes which has ever been paid to human liberty by one of the world's great writers:

> We speak of liberty as one thing and of virtue, wealth, knowledge, invention, national strength, and national independence as other things. But of all these liberty is the source, the mother, the necessary condition. She is to virtue what light is to color, to wealth what sunshine is to grain, to knowledge what eyes are to sight. She is a genius of invention, the brawn of national strength, the spirit of national independence. Where liberty rises there virtue grows, wealth increases, knowledge expands, invention multiplies human powers, and in strength and spirit the freer nation rises among her neighbors as Saul amid his brethren—taller and fairer. Where liberty sinks there virtue fades, wealth diminishes, knowledge is forgotten, invention ceases, and empires once mighty in arms and arts become a helpless prey to freer barbarians. * * *
> Liberty came to a race of slaves crouching under Egyptian whips and led them forth from the house of bondage. She hardened them in the desert and made of them a race of conquerors. The free spirit of the Mosaic law took their thinkers up to heights where they beheld the unity of God and inspired their poets with strains that yet phrase the highest exaltations of thought. Liberty dawned on the Phœnician coast and ships passed the Pillars of Hercules to plow the unknown sea. She shed a partial light on Greece and marble grew to shapes of ideal beauty, words became the instruments of subtlest thought, and against the scanty militia of free cities the countless hosts of the great king broke like surges against a rock. She cast her beam on the 4-acre farms of Italian husbandmen, and born of her strength a power come forth that conquered the world. * * * Out of the night that followed her eclipse her slanting rays fell again on free cities and a lost learning revived, modern civilization began, a new world was unveiled; and as liberty grew, so grew art, wealth, power, knowledge and refinement. In the history of every nation we may read the same truth. It was the strength born of Magna Charta that won Crecy and Agincourt. It was the revival of liberty from the despotism of the Tudors that glorified the Elizabethan age. It was the spirit that brought a crowned tyrant to the block that planted here the seed of a mighty tree. It was the energy of ancient freedom that the moment it had gained unity made Spain the mightiest power of the world, only to fall to the lowest depth of weakness when tyranny succeeded liberty. * * *
> Shall we not trust her?
> In our time, as in times before, creep on the insidious forces that producing inequality destroy liberty. On the horizon the clouds begin to lower. Liberty calls to us again. We must follow her further; we must trust her fully. Either we must wholly accept her or she will not stay. It is not enough that men should vote; it is not enough that they should be theoretically equal before the law. They must have liberty to avail themselves of the opportunities and means of life; they must stand on equal terms with reference to the bounty of nature. Either this or liberty withdraws her light; either this or darkness comes on and the very forces that progress has evolved turn to powers that work destruction. This is the universal law. This is the lesson of the centuries. Unless its foundations be laid in justice the social structure can not stand.

THE ABUSE OF THE POWER OF INJUNCTION

One of the indefensible things contained in a great many of the labor injunctions issued by Federal judges is the enjoining of the defendants from exercising their legal right under State law, given them by a State statute.

Labor unions usually provide for a fund out of which benefits are paid to their members when they are out of employment, including the time when they are out of employment on account of a strike. The members of the union who are out of employment are entitled, under the rules of their organization, to these benefits. They have themselves contributed to this fund. They have a direct interest in it. The fund is accumulated by dues paid by the members and the object of it is to assist the members when they are out of employment in the support of themselves and their families. Some of these injunctions issued by Federal judges enjoin the unions from paying their members who are on strike any of the benefits to which they are entitled from these funds accumulated by their own contributions. In such cases the money in this fund is in the possession of the proper officers. Under the rules and regulations of the organization it is the duty of these officers to pay these benefits to their fellows who are out of work. They are willing and anxious to perform their duty, but the strong arm of a Federal injunction prevents them from doing this act, from complying with their agreement, from performing their duties as officers of the union.

These injunctions often go still farther. Not only do they prohibit the workmen from thus contributing to their fellows but the injunction prohibits anyone, whether he is a member of the union or not, from giving any assistance or contributing any funds or other money to men who are on a strike.

But many of these injunctions go still farther. It is a common thing in the operation of coal mines for laborers to live in houses owned by the corporation owning or operating the mines. These houses—in many cases it would be more proper to term them shacks—are leased to the laboring man under contract by which the laborer agrees to pay a certain amount monthly or otherwise as a rental for the occupation, and providing also for the surrender of the premises under conditions named in the contract of lease. If a dispute arises between the employer and the employee as to whether or not the contract has been violated and as to whether the owner has a right to dispossess the employee, the question at once becomes one of forcible entry and detainer under the laws of the State where the property is located. These laws invariably provide for the trial of forcible entry and detainer cases before a justice of the peace. Upon the trial before the justice either side is given the right to appeal to a higher court. If the judgment of the justice of the peace is against the laboring man, the tenant, if he desires to appeal his case, has to give bond, not only for the costs in the case, as is usual in all cases, but also for the payment of a reasonable rental in case the decision of the higher court is against him. This is a right given him under the State law. It is a right that is general and applies to all cases between landlord and tenant. If the tenant is wrongfully holding possession of the premises, no loss can come to the landlord because, before he can appeal he must put up a bond to pay both costs and rental.

Many of these injunctions issued in Federal courts by Federal judges enjoin the tenant from taking the appeal given to him under a State law. Not only is the defendant enjoined but every and all persons are enjoined from going on the bond or from giving any advice or assistance of any kind to the laboring man who is a defendant in such forcible-entry and detainer cases. All persons, whether they belong to the union or not, or whether they are defendants in the case or not, are enjoined from paying any money in the way of expenses in behalf of the defendant in such a case. The injunction sometimes goes far enough to prevent anyone from acting as attorney or from giving any legal advice to an employee whom the company is trying to eject from one of these houses. And very often all persons are enjoined from furnishing any food or fuel or any other necessity of life to any one of these defendants who happens to be living in one of these houses and who is out on a strike. Such injunctions have often resulted in the greatest kind of hardship and misery suffered by these coal miners. Under these unconscionable orders relief of any kind can not be given. Sickness, hunger, and cold can not be relieved. I know of no other instances in jurisprudence where such hardships have been upheld and where such summary methods of depriving persons of their "day in court" have been held to be "due process of law." By no conceivable stretch of the imagination can such instances of judicial cruelty be condoned or defended.

The bill under consideration takes away from the Federal courts the power to issue such injunctions and in the same section (sec. 4) the bill prohibits the issuing of injunctions which restrain employees from—

(f) Assembling peaceably to act or to organize to act in promotion of their interests in a labor dispute.

It prohibits the issuing of injunctions restraining anyone from inducing, assisting, counseling, or advising, without fraud or violence, any of these things, regardless of whether or not the employee may have signed a "yellow-dog" contract.

Injunctions have been issued which restrain employees engaged in a strike from giving publicity to the existence of or the facts involved in any labor dispute. In these cases the strikers are prohibited from telling anyone that a strike is in existence or from telling anyone that the company requires its men to sign a "yellow-dog" contract.

One of the most recent injunctions in a labor dispute was issued in the District Court of the United States for the Northern District of Iowa. This injunction was issued on the 29th day of March, 1930. When I was furnished a copy of this injunction I did not believe that it was true. I could not believe that any judge would issue such a cruel document. I thought I was being imposed upon and I wrote a letter to the clerk of the court and asked him to certify to me a correct copy of the injunction which had been issued. I found that I had been correctly informed and that the first copy which had been furnished me was a true copy of the official document. This injunction enjoined the defendants from doing many things. Among others, it enjoined them from—

* * * printing, publishing, issuing, circulating, and distributing, or otherwise communicating, directly or indirectly, in writing or verbally, to any person, association of persons, or corporation, any statement or notice of any kind or character whatsoever, stating or representing:

(1) That there is a strike at the mill or plant of complainant at Fort Dodge, Iowa; or that the strike of 1921 is still in existence; or that there is a controversy over wages or conditions of employment between complainant and its employees; or any false statement with reference to conditions of employment at complainant's plant.

Let me invite your attention to that word "false," because some one will say the injunction is against false statements of this kind. Not at all. The statement may be absolutely true. The only case where the word "false" applies is "any false statement with reference to conditions of employment at complainant's plant."

I continue reading from the injunction:

(2) That complainant is unfair to organized union labor, or that its products are or were unfair to organized labor, or are on an unfair list.

(3) That complainant forces or requires its employees to sign or subscribe to the so-called "yellow-dog" contract.

It will be observed that in this case the defendants were not allowed to tell anyone a strike was in progress. When the laboring man went home at night to his family, if he told his wife that a strike was on, he would be liable for arrest for contempt of court and to be sent to jail as a punishment. These men were not allowed to give any publicity in any way to the fact that a strike existed; and, although they might know of their own personal knowledge that employees were required to sign the "yellow-dog" contract, yet they would not dare tell even members of their own families of this fact. Their mouths were absolutely closed, and free speech was absolutely forbidden. They could not be allowed in such a case to seek advice from an attorney. The son would not be allowed to consult with his father on the subject. When the laboring man did not go to his work in the morning he would not even be allowed to tell his own wife why.

Under the laws of the State it would be perfectly proper and a defendant would have a perfect right to go out on the street and tell everyone he met that a strike was in progress; or that he, before he could get a job, was compelled to sign the "yellow dog" contract. He would have a perfect right, under the State law, to consult an attorney and to lay all the facts before him, and to ascertain from a legal standpoint what his rights were, but, under this cruel injunction order, all those rights were swept away. State laws were all nullified and the fundamental right of human liberty and freedom was absolutely and completely denied.

And suppose one of these defendants disobeyed this injunction? He would not be violating any State law! He would be doing only what every human being has a right to do! No statute of any State or the Federal Government would preclude him from giving full publicity to all of the facts. But, under this judge-made law, a new statute was put in force—not by the legislature of the State, not by anyone having authority to enact a statute, but by the judge sitting on the Federal bench.

And let us suppose, too, that for a violation of this order, one of the defendants was arrested. Where would he be tried? Would it be in the courts of the State where the offense is alleged to have been committed? No. It would be before the same judge who made the law. The judge who, acting as a legislator, made the law. He would sit as a judge to try an offense for violation of the judge-made law. In such a case the defendant would have committed a crime as defined by this arbitrary law in the shape of an injunction—not a crime under the State law, not a crime under any Federal law, but a crime made so by an arbitrary order of a judge, who is not supposed, under our Constitution and laws, to have any legislative authority. And if, when he was arrested, there was a dispute as to whether he had violated the order of the judge and thus committed a crime, would he have the right to lay his case before a jury of his peers? Would the constitution and the laws of the State where the alleged offense was committed control in such trial? No. No jury could sit in that case. Who would be the jury? The answer is, the judge—the same person who made the law, the same person who fixes the penalty. He would fix the punishment and he would render the judgment, and at his will the defendant would go to jail for a time limited only by the discretion of the same judge.

The vilest criminal, under our legal system, would not be deprived of these fundamental rights and privileges. The common hobo, the escaped convict—all are protected when they are charged with a crime by the right to have the matter settled by a jury, and they can not, under the law, be found guilty unless the evidence shows they are guilty beyond a reasonable doubt. But this judge, who made the law, who issued the order, who fixed the penalty, and who tries the case, would be guided by no rule of evidence known to our system of jurisprudence. There would be no one to tell the defendant that he was entitled to every reasonable doubt and that he must be acquitted unless proven guilty beyond a reasonable doubt.

The result is that the rights of defendants, under our system, are completely taken away. Something is made a crime which is not a crime under the law. The penalty is fixed, not by a legislature but by one man sitting on the bench. So far as I know, such arbitrary action very seldom occurs except in labor disputes. The defendants in such cases are poor. Sometimes many of them are uneducated. They have no money of their own to defend themselves, and these injunctions make it impossible for any of their friends or any sympathizing citizens to come to their assistance, financially or otherwise, or to even give them advice. They are thus singled out. They stand alone, faced on the one side by great combinations of wealth, unable to defend themselves and prevented from being defended by any other persons who might become interested in their welfare. They must take the punishment administered by the man who made the law and who has fixed the penalty.

It has long been recognized by students of the law and acknowledged by experts in government that the power to make a law and the power to enforce the law should be completely separate, and that such separation is absolutely necessary as a protection against tyranny. Those who wrote our Constitution were careful to keep the judicial power separate from the legislative power and the administrative power. But these injunctions do away with all those fundamental principles of government and put in the hands of one man the right to make the law, the right to enforce the law, the right to fix a penalty, the right to try those who it is alleged have offended the law thus made, and the right to inflict at their own sweet will whatever punishment they believe should be administered. It was many years ago that the great legal writer Blackstone used the following language:

> In all tyrannical government the supreme magistracy or the right of making and enforcing laws is vested in one and the same man or one and the same body of men, and wherever these two powers are united together there can be no public liberty. (1 Blackstone, 142.)

Pomeroy, an acknowledged authority, in his Equity Jurisprudence, has this to say on the subject:

> The courts have thus been required to face such questions as the nature and extent of the capitalist's rights in the management of his business and of the workingman's property in his labor; to decide how far the employer shall be protected in his right to have labor and custom flow to him free from the interference of third parties, and how far the laborer shall be protected from similar interference in his contract of employment or his right to secure employment; to determine what limits shall be placed upon individuals and combinations of individuals in seeking their economic advancement at the expense of their fellows. All these and other problems have come before the courts in rapid succession. (Pomeroy, Equity Jurisprudence (4th ed.), vol. 5, p. 4566, sec. 2018.)

Is it any wonder that there has grown up a feeling of resentment against some of the actions of some Federal judges? Is it any wonder that there has gradually grown up in the minds of ordinary people a feeling of prejudice against Federal courts? Is it surprising that there should develop a sentiment against life tenure for Federal trial judges? Can anyone doubt that such action on the part of the Federal judiciary has gradually developed in the minds of ordinary people a fear that where a system of jurisprudence prevails which enables one man, endowed with a life tenure of office, to write a law and then order its enforcement, and then, refusing a jury, to try alleged offenders and punish them at his own sweet will, it will eventually lead us to the common knowledge and belief that where such things exist, as Blackstone says, "There can be no public liberty."

It is difficult to see how any civilized people would indefinitely submit to such tyrannical treatment, and, indeed, it would undoubtedly be true that there would not have been submission if this procedure were general and applied to all classes of people. It is because it applies only to the poor, to laboring men in labor disputes, that the great bulk of our people have not yet realized the great evil to human liberty and to popular government which such procedure brings about.

It is not difficult to see how such injunctions, violating the spirit of a free government, should frighten persons against whom such injunctions are issued and drive them to desperation. What free American citizen, let me ask, is willing to submit to such a violation of his sacred rights, which most of us had supposed were fully protected by our Constitution and our laws?

The bill under discussion makes all such injunctions impossible, and, if enacted into law, this shameful picture of human suffering and human misery brought about by judge-made law will be an impossibility.

Wherever it can be done this bill applies equally to organizations of labor and to organizations of capital. Organizations of employees and organizations of capital are treated exactly the same. The bill does not protect anyone, whether he be an employer or an employee, from punishment for the commission of any unlawful act, either as against property or as against persons.

It sometimes happens that detectives representing large corporations have been employed for the purpose of conveying information concerning the activities of laboring men to the corporation employing them. A notable instance of this kind was in the case of the street-railway strike in Indianapolis, Ind. There, two men were employed by the company as such detectives. They applied for admission to the union and were admitted. Subsequent evidence disclosed that these men were the most active of any of the men of the union in favor of drastic action on the part of the laboring men. They did all they could to incite the men to the commission of all kinds of illegal and unreasonable acts, and then the strong hand of the injunction was brought forth with its usual effect of frightening and disheartening members of the union. And in that particular case, I think it is fair to say that the members of the subcommittee who held the hearings were dumfounded at the way in which members of the union were tried and convicted for contempt of court, where it seemed on the face of the evidence that the men convicted were not only innocent of a violation of the order of the court, illegal though it probably was, but that they had done their best to prevent the men from taking any action which would in any way violate the injunctive order.

In that case the workers before they were organized asked that some one be sent from an organized union to come to Indianapolis for the purpose of organizing the street-car employees into a union. At their request two organizers were sent to the city. These men, when they reached the city, were arrested on various kinds of charges not in any way connected with the object of their visit. Charges were made against them, and they were arrested. They had to arrange for bail to keep themselves out of jail while waiting for their various trials. Being strangers in the city and most of the other laboring men being financially unable to go on their bonds, arrangements were made through some bonding company to furnish bail. It was necessary, of course, in the cases, for them to pay the bonding companies. Their cases were continued and were never, in fact, brought to trial. When one of the cases reached a stage where it could no longer be continued the case was dismissed and the men were rearrested on some other charge of a similar nature. In this way their finances were used up, and they were worn out.

I may add, speaking from memory of the hearings, though I think I remember them accurately, that these men were arrested fifty-one times in something like 60 days and were never once tried. When the case finally came to trial—perhaps there was a charge in a police court of vagrancy or some other charge for which there was no foundation—it was dismissed, but before the men got out of the courthouse they were arrested again on a similar charge.

Laboring men are not financially able to pay the expenses which are necessary to make proper defenses. They are confronted with corporations having unlimited means, with attorneys of the greatest ability, and in such cases, if they have to try their case before a judge who is unsympathetic, it is necessary for their cases to be appealed. The harsh way in which the men are treated and the severity of these terrible injunctions break them down, even before trial, and the greatest damages are often done in cases which never reach the higher courts. A man who is confronted with an order which deprives him of all legal assistance, from seeking sympathetic advice, especially if he is an uneducated and ignorant person, is broken down before the case reaches the stage of a trial. He realizes that the judge-made law is made for him alone. He realizes that the man who made the law will be the man who tries him for contempt, and he realizes that the same man will administer punishment—a punishment not in accordance with law but in accordance with his individual opinion and judgment.

It is impossible to report with accuracy the number of injunctions issued either in State or Federal courts. As I have said, only a small percentage of them are reported officially. Approximately 300 injunctions were issued in the railway shopmen's strike of 1922, but only 12 were officially reported. Evidence taken by the subcommittee of the Committee on the Judiciary was to the effect that 389 labor injunctions in State and Federal courts were issued during the last decade, and that the most of these are unreported. Out of over 260 cases listed by the Massachusetts Bureau of Statistics in the period of 1898–1916, only 18 were officially reported. This is because, as I have said, defendants in these cases are financially unable to defend themselves in court. Most of the injunction proceedings never go beyond a restraining order or at best beyond a temporary injunction.

Prior to 1890, injunctions in labor disputes were practically unknown, but the issuing of restraining orders and injunctions has rapidly increased since that time, until now it is seldom that any controversy of importance between capital and labor takes place without the issuing of one or more injunctions.

PROCEDURE

Mr. President, this bill, in section 7, provides for the procedure which shall be followed in case application is made for a restraining order or a temporary or permanent injunction. It provides that before a temporary or permanent injunction shall be issued there must be an opportunity for the defendants to be heard, and that at such hearing they shall have the right to cross-examine witnesses who testify in behalf of the issuing of such an order. The court must also permit the defendants to offer witnesses and to take their oral testimony in open court; and the court is not authorized to issue a temporary injunction after such hearing unless the court finds that unlawful acts have been committed and will be committed unless restrained; that as to each item of relief granted greater injury will be inflicted upon complainant by the denial of relief than will be inflicted upon defendants by the granting of relief; and that complainant has no adequate remedy at law. The bill also provides that no temporary or permanent injunction shall be issued unless the court finds that the public officers charged with the duty to protect complainant's property are unable or unwilling to furnish adequate protection.

The bill, however, permits a temporary restraining order without notice, but in order to secure this the judge issuing the order must take the testimony, under oath, of witnesses, and the evidence must be sufficient, if sustained, to justify the court in issuing an injunction upon hearing with notice. In other words, a restraining order without notice can not be issued except upon the sworn testimony of witnesses, and that testimony must be sufficient to sustain an injunction in case the same evidence were offered with notice.

This can be no hardship to the complainant in the case. If the plaintiff is not able to produce sufficient evidence without notice, certainly he would not be able to produce sufficient evidence with notice. The greatest danger of damage comes in cases where restraining orders or temporary injunctions are issued without any notice to the defendants. This, in effect, takes away the protection with which the law always tries to surround the defendant by requiring that a summons be served or a notice given before any judgment shall be rendered against him. It must also appear, before a temporary restraining order can be issued without notice, that the giving of the notice would of itself result in irreparable damage to the complainant's property.

A restraining order without notice, under the bill, shall not be in force longer than five days. The usual provision for the giving of bond before the issuing of such temporary order is also provided for.

It is also provided, in section 8, that no restraining order or injunction relief shall be granted to anyone who has failed to comply with any obligation imposed by law which is involved in the labor dispute in question or who has failed to make every reasonable effort to settle such dispute either by negotiation or with the aid of any governmental machinery provided for arbitration.

JURY TRIAL IN CONTEMPT CASES

This bill provides that a person charged with contempt for the violation of a restraining order or injunction shall have the right to a trial by jury. There is one exception to this, however, and that is where alleged contempt is committed in the presence of the court or so near thereto as to directly interfere with the administration of justice. Then the defendant is not entitled to a jury trial.

As I have already stated, the effect of an injunction is to make something illegal which is not illegal under the law of the land. It makes something a crime which is not a crime under public law. The punishment for such a crime is just the same as the punishment for the violation of any criminal statute of any State or of the Federal Government. Why should a defendant be entitled to a jury trial in one case and not in the other? If a defendant is sent to jail for the violation of a statute made by the judge, his punishment is just as severe, his suffering is just as great as though he were sent to jail for the violation of a criminal statute. Why should the procedure be different in these two cases? If a laboring man meets his neighbor upon the street and strikes him down with his fist, he has committed a crime against the State law; but, when he is arrested, he has a right to a jury trial. If the same laboring man meets the same neighbor on the same street and tells him that a strike at a certain factory is in progress, or that laborers in a certain mill are required to sign a "yellow-dog" contract before they can get employment, or gives him any information of a like kind where a judge has issued an order making it a crime to give such information, then the defendant has no right to demand a jury trial. He is tried by the same judge who made the order. The author of the law sits in judgment in a case involving an alleged violation of a law which he himself has made. How can you distinguish between the two cases?

In each case the defendant is charged with a violation of law. One is a written law passed by the legislature of his State. The other is an order made by a Federal judge, making something a crime which was not a crime before. If there should be any difference, it ought to be just the reverse of what it is. If there is a reason for a man to have a jury trial when it is alleged he has violated some State statute, there is a double reason why he should have a jury trial when he has violated some judge-made law, especially where he is going to be tried before the same judge who made the law. If a defendant is charged with a crime which will take him to jail if he is found guilty, how can we say that under the law of the land he shall have a jury trial in one case and shall be denied a jury trial in the other?

A procedure which violates this fundamental right of a trial by jury in criminal cases, even though it be a case of contempt, violates every sense of common justice, of human freedom, and of personal liberty.

Section 12 of the bill under consideration gives to any defendant who is charged with contempt of court the right to file with the court a demand for the retirement of the judge sitting in the proceeding in all cases where the alleged contempt arose from an attack upon the character or conduct of the judge and where such attack occurred otherwise than in open court. When such a demand is filed under oath, the judge shall proceed no further, but another judge will be designated in the same manner as provided in other cases to hear and try the contempt charge.

It will be noted that this section is general. It has no specific relation to a labor dispute, but is intended more fully to reach the case where newspapers have been charged with contempt because it is alleged they have made improper remarks in their publications in regard to the conduct of a judge in any case pending before him. The conscience of the country was shocked a year or two ago when a newspaper publisher was haled into court by the judge for something he had said in his paper in the way of criticism. The same person against whom the criticism was made sat in judgment. He presided at the trial which took place without a jury, and the charge was improper conduct leveled against the man who was presiding in the case.

The bill does not attempt to relieve any newspaper publisher from anything which, under existing law, would make him liable. But we do believe that such publisher ought to have the right to a fair and impartial trial before a judge not having a direct, personal interest in the outcome of the case. There is no reason why, in such case, some unbiased judge should not sit upon the bench and preside in such a trial. There is every reason in the world why the judge who seemed to have been offended by what the newspaper stated should not sit in judgment upon his own case. This is nothing but common, ordinary justice. It is not any legal refinement. It is simply good, ordinary, common sense, and no legal ability is required to recognize its justice.

There are several other things in the bill; but, in my judgment, no serious conflict will arise with reference to them. I have discussed, I think, all of the provisions of the bill which are contested, or which, for any reason, are claimed to be unjust or unconstitutional.

What we ought to do is to have the same rule of law apply to the poor as to the rich; to the ignorant as well as to the wise; to the weak as well as to the strong. This bill does nothing more. It provides for no avenue of escape for anyone who is guilty of fraud or violence. It limits the injunction to such cases as common, ordinary justice demands it should be limited. It permits laboring men to organize for the purpose of improving their conditions. It recognizes their right to organize in defense of their rights and their labors. It prevents great aggregations of capital from combining against the weak and the poor in any way which would deprive them of the ordinary rights of free American citizens. It attempts to weigh in the scales of justice all the elements which ought to be considered in passing upon controversies between labor and capital. It asks for the laboring man nothing that it does not concede to the corporation. Its enactment into law will, I believe, do away with much of the criticism which is now made—justly, I think—against the Federal courts. After all, a court, to be effective, must be respected. It is the duty of all citizens to obey all of the orders and judgments of our courts, but the success of our courts and the perpetuity of our Government will be seriously affected and retarded if its orders are unjust and unfair.

I believe, therefore, that the enactment of this bill into law will not only prevent injustices in labor disputes but that its effect will be to place upon a higher plane all of our courts, and eventually bring faith in and respect for all our judiciary tribunals.

JUDGE WILKERSON'S INJUNCTIONS

In conclusion, it seems to me it would be very appropriate to call to the attention of the Senate the record of Judge Wilkerson in the issuing of injunctions in labor disputes. This record is particularly applicable now, when the President of the United States has sent the name of this judge to the Senate in his effort to promote him to the circuit court of appeals. This nomination for such promotion is now pending before the Judiciary Committee of the Senate.

Judge Wilkerson was appointed as district judge by President Harding, under the advice and at the suggestion of Attorney General Harry M. Daugherty. Hardly was the ink on the commission dry before the same Attorney General applied to this judge and secured of him a sweeping injunction applying to many thousands of railroad employees. This injunction was issued at a time when the dispute between the railroads and their employees was in a fair way of settlement, and contained many of the obnoxious provisions which are almost invariably included in labor injunctions.

Incidentally, this case illustrates the close connection between the judge and the appointive power. After all, judges are human beings; and it is perhaps too much to expect that a judge just appointed to the bench, where he has a life tenure, should be able to resist the request of the Attorney General whose recommendation probably brought him the appointment. Congress, therefore, should see to it that the law is so plain and so explicit that even the weaknesses of human nature would not be sufficient to lead the judge astray in such cases where the temptation is admittedly great.

Another illustration of a conscienceless injunction issued by Judge Wilkerson was the injunction issued in the case against the Chicago Federation of Musicians and others. This injunction was issued on the first day of September, 1928, at 10 o'clock in the forenoon. The then existing contracts of the musicians with motion-picture houses expired the very next day, September 3, which was Sunday, and new contracts had not been agreed upon. Negotiations had been pending for some time between these musicians and the theater houses, but no definite agreement had been made. The musicians were asking that certain conditions be included in the new contracts of employment, which the employers and receivers for some of these houses were resisting. At this time, while these negotiations were pending and the day before these contracts expired by their own terms, these theaters commenced this action against their employees, and without any notice to the defendants the judge issued another one of his famous restraining orders.

In this injunction, among other things, the defendants were restrained from enforcing certain provisions of their own by-laws. It seems that these musicians, in their own organizations, had various stipulations in their by-laws; and this judge, upon the filing of the complaint by the plaintiffs, and without any notice whatever that such an application was pending, issued an order restraining the defendants from in any way, directly or indirectly, enforcing the provisions of the by-laws. In other words, the injunction restrained the defendants from making the demands which they were making in their negotiations with their employees. In some instances, in effect, it required these musicians to amend their by-laws. It restrained them, also—

> From ordering, commanding, directing, or causing any strike * * *.

It likewise enjoined the defendants—

> From leaving or threatening to leave the employment of said receivers, either by way of strike or otherwise, unless with the consent of said receivers * * *.

The injunction also restrained the defendants—

> From imposing upon or levying or ordering against any member of said union any fine, penalty, suspension, erasure, expulsion, or assessment of whatsoever character for failure to leave the employment of said receivers, for refusal to refrain from seeking or accepting employment of said receivers, for refusal to obey any command, order, rule, by-law, provision, direction, hint, suggestion, or request of whatsoever character of said union or any officer, committee, or member thereof that he leave or refrain from seeking or accepting such employment, or for refusal to do, perform, aid, assist, counsel, command, direct, or acquiesce in any act forbidden by this order.

In this wonderful injunction there is just one ray of hope. The injunction did contain a provision that the defendants should have a right to appear in court and petition the court for a modification of this drastic order. What a wonderful and merciful thing that was.

The injunction was issued at 10 o'clock on Saturday morning. I presume before it was served it was probably late in the afternoon of Saturday. The court was not in session, of course, on Sunday. The contracts expired on Sunday by their own terms and, by the terms of the decree, these defendants were restrained from quitting the employment of the plaintiffs unless the plaintiffs consented. If they continued to negotiate on new contracts, they were restrained in such negotiations from even asking their employers to put certain things in the contract for which the defendants had been contending. They were compelled to remain in the employment after the expiration of their written contracts and were not even allowed, in trying to get new contracts, to ask that anything should be put in those contracts which the employers did not want put in.

I wonder if anyone will contend that such an order issued by Judge Wilkerson is not, in effect, an order of involuntary servitude? Can anyone claim for a moment that it is not a decree of human slavery? This calls to our attention not only that we should enact proper legislation on this subject but that we should likewise be careful in passing upon any nomination which the President may make in the appointment of a judge to sit in judgment upon the law we shall make. Not only is it necessary that the proper law be passed but it is equally important that no person should be selected to administer the law as judge whose bias and prejudice and whose inclination might lead him to find a loophole of some kind by which such unconscionable injunctions could be issued.

This case and the others which I have enumerated illustrate the necessity of passing a law which can not be nullified even by judges who have no sympathy with those who toil when their interests conflict with great aggregations of wealth. It brings to our minds the almost superhuman importance of an untarnished judiciary. A perfect law can be nullified by an unfair and biased judge. It is a source of great satisfaction to be able to say that the great majority of our judges are above reproach. But the method of their selection often makes it possible for political bosses, political machines, and wealthy corporations which have made political contributions to name Federal judges who shall sit during their lifetime as arbiters between those who toil and those who sit in high places and from their luxurious quarters of wealth sometimes name the President, who, in turn, will nominate the judges; and one of the ways in which their investment can be returned manyfold is the selection of judges who are either their abject tools or whose viewpoint is such that they honestly and conscientiously believe that monopoly is always right and that the toiling masses are always wrong.

This, very logically, leads us to the selection of a Chief Magistrate—a President of the United States. Under our antiquated Electoral College system, which has no more place in a free government than a fifth wheel on a wagon, a system has grown up by which the people have but little to say in the selection of a President. Under this illogical system, in order to be elected the President must first be nominated by one of the dominant political parties. We all know that, as a general rule, the people themselves have but little influence in a national party convention. Too often Presidents are nominated in the wee, small hours of the night, in a dingy, smoky atmosphere, where the musical tinkle of clinking glasses is heard amid the booming of flying corks. Too often the people at the general election have only a choice between two evils; but when the election is over and the preelection promises are redeemed, it sometimes occurs that the demands of those who have contributed the money to carry on the fake contest are sufficiently influential to place upon the Federal bench persons who, after all, are only the tools of the corporations which made them.

It is because we have now on the bench some judges—and undoubtedly we will have others—who lack that judicial poise necessary in passing upon the disputes between labor and capital that such a law as is proposed in this bill is necessary.

Mr. CUTTING. Mr. President, I want to ask the Senator a question specifically concerning the provisions in regard to contempt of court, section 11 and section 12.

I understood from the Senator's remarks that section 11 was confined to cases of restraining orders or injunctions in labor disputes, and that section 12, on the other hand, included all cases of contempt of court. The Senator specifically mentioned cases of newspaper criticism of judges.

Mr. NORRIS. Section 11 applies to labor disputes; section 12 is general and applies to any kind of a general proceeding.

Mr. CUTTING. Section 12 merely allows a defendant to ask that another judge shall sit in the case, one other than the judge who has been criticized?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. CUTTING. Whereas section 11 provides for a jury trial. I have been wondering whether a jury trial should not be granted to all defendants in contempt of court cases.

I personally have had exactly the experience which the Senator describes, of having been haled into court to justify criticism of a particular judge by the judge himself. My defense, of course, was the truth of the charges, which the judge rather naturally found were untrue.

I quite admit that it would have been a relief to some extent to have had some other judge sitting in the case; but I am sure the Senator will recognize that there is a certain feeling of solidarity between various judges which makes it rather difficult for any one of them to decide that his brother judge had been justly criticized.

To my mind, trial by jury is the only effective defense in these cases, and I should like at some time during the consideration of the bill to offer an amendment, which I hope the Senator will accept, to provide jury trial in all cases of indirect contempt; that is, of contempt not committed in the actual presence of the court.

Mr. NORRIS. Does not the Senator think section 11 gives it?

Mr. CUTTING. It provides:

In all cases in which a person shall be charged with contempt for violation of a restraining order or injunction issued by a court of the United States (as herein defined).

Mr. NORRIS. I see the Senator's point. As far as I can see, I would not have any objection to amending section 11 so that it would apply to cases of indirect contempt.

Mr. CUTTING. I shall draw an amendment and offer it at the proper time.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, while this subject is before us, I would like to say that I see nothing in section 11 which does not make it applicable to all cases, whether labor cases or otherwise.

Mr. NORRIS. It does apply to all cases, but the Senator from New Mexico calls our attention to the fact that it applies only in cases where the contempt is charged because of violation of an injunctive order. The contempt mentioned in section 12 is a different kind of contempt. It refers to cases where no order has issued to begin with. A newspaper, for instance, might make an attack on a judge, but would not be violating any order of injunction, and it would not come under section 11, because under that section one must violate an order a judge has made. The case for which the Senator from New Mexico wants to get a jury trial is one where there has been no order issued, but a court has cited some one for contempt without any order having been issued.

Mr. BLAINE. I merely want to call the Senator's attention to the fact that the committee did consider that question in connection with a bill introduced by the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG], but it was intended to cover all cases of indirect criminal contempt. I would assume that there would be no objection to making section 11 expressly applicable to all cases, whether there was a violation of a restraining order or injunction or not.

Mr. CUTTING. That was my purpose.

Mr. BORAH. But the Senator from New Mexico is interested in a proposition where no injunction order may have been issued at all. If a newspaper criticizes a court, whether the court has issued an injunction order or not, the court may cite the newspaper for contempt. The Senator from New Mexico is interested in having such a case as that tried by jury.

Mr. NORRIS. I am in entire sympathy with what the Senator wants to accomplish.

RELIEF OF IRRIGATION PROJECT WATER USERS

Mr. CAREY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 3706, for the temporary relief of water users on irrigation projects constructed and operated under the reclamation law.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That any irrigation district, water-users' association, or other water-users' organization under contract with the United States for payment of construction charges under the act of June 17, 1902 (32 Stat. 388), or acts amendatory thereof or supplementary thereto, including the act of February 21, 1911 (36 Stat. 923) (upon acceptance of this act by resolution of its board of directors or corresponding body), shall be required to make no payment on the regular construction charge for the calendar year 1931, and in lieu of the regular installment of construction charge provided for under existing contracts may pay for the calendar year 1932 on the basis of 50 per cent of the amount which, but for this act, would be payable under said contracts, such amount to be computed and determined for that year in the manner provided in said contracts and the law applicable thereto. Interest and penalty as now provided by law and contracts for nonpayments when due shall apply on all charges for 1932 adjusted as herein authorized. No interest or penalty shall be payable on that portion of the charges herein authorized to be deferred: Provided, That in determining the rate for the sale of power during the irrigation season of 1931 to irrigation districts from any power plant operated by the Bureau of Reclamation interest on the cost of the power system shall not be included as an element, but interest at the rate of 2½ per cent per annum shall be included as an element of such rate for the sale of power to such districts during the irrigation season of 1932.

SEC. 2. On projects or divisions of projects where no irrigation district, water-users' association, or other water-users' organization has assumed joint obligation for payment of construction charges individual water-right applicants or entrymen, upon acceptance of this act in a manner satisfactory to the Secretary of the Interior, shall be required to make no payment on the regular construction charge for the calendar year 1931, and in lieu of the installments payable under existing contracts may pay their regular installments of construction charges for the calendar year 1932 on the same basis as that authorized in section 1 hereof for districts, associations, and other water-users' organizations.

SEC. 3. The act of Congress approved January 31, 1931, entitled "An act for the relief of the Uncompahgre reclamation project, Colorado" (Private, No. 300, 71st Cong.), is hereby amended to extend for one year from and after January 1, 1932, the time for beginning construction of drainage system upon the Uncompahgre project, and any and all construction charges accruing upon or for said project for or during the year 1932, shall be deferred and included in and made payable as a part of the project supplemental construction charge provided for in said act of January 31, 1931; and in order to afford opportunity to complete the construction authorized by the act of Congress approved February 21, 1931 (Public, No. 708), relating to the Grand Valley reclamation project, Colorado, any and all construction charges accruing upon or for said project for or during the year 1932 shall be deferred without interest and penalties and shall be included in and made payable as project supplemental construction charges.

SEC. 4. At the expiration of the period for which deferment of charges is made under this act, all districts, water-users' associations, or other water-users' organizations, and all individuals accepting the provisions hereof shall resume payment of charges on the basis of and in accordance with existing contracts and shall continue payments thereafter until the entire indebtedness of said districts, water-users' associations, or other water-users' organizations, and individuals to the United States shall have been fully paid. In the case of a district, water-users' association or other water-users' organization, or individual having contracts executed pursuant to the act of February 21, 1911 (36 Stat. 925), the act of August 13, 1914 (38 Stat. 686), or the act of May 25, 1926 (444 Stat. 636), or any special act the deferred construction installment or installments for the calendar year 1931, and that portion of the 1932 installment or installments deferred, together with the installment or installments of deferred construction and/or operation and maintenance for 1931 and 50 per cent of the installment and/or installments of such deferred charges for 1932, shall be paid as an additional installment to be due and payable one year after the date the last installment under existing contracts shall become due, except in those cases in which the Secretary of the Interior, whose decision shall be final, shall find necessary additional installments, which he is hereby authorized to fix. In the case of any district, water-users' association, or other water-users' organization, or individual under contract for payment of construction charge pursuant to subsection F, section 4, act of December 5, 1924 (43 Stat. 702), construction payments shall be continued on the basis of existing contracts until the entire indebtedness to the United States, including all charges deferred pursuant to this act, shall have been fully paid. Installments so carried over shall be subjected to the reductions provided for in section 7 hereof.

SEC. 5. The Secretary of the Interior, in his discretion, and upon acceptance of the provisions of this section by the water users affected, in the manner provided in sections 1 and 2 hereof, may permit adjustment of construction and/or operation and maintenance charges heretofore deferred by contracts made pursuant to existing law to be made for the years 1931 and 1932 on the basis authorized in sections 1 and 2 hereof or on such other basis as the Secretary may find to be required in each case.

SEC. 6. The Secretary of the Interior, in his discretion, is further authorized to defer the payment to the United States from any water users' organization, as defined in section 1 hereof and from any individual water-right applicant or entryman of construction charges and installments of deferred construction and/or deferred operation and maintenance charges for the calendar year 1930 and prior thereto. Such deferred charges, together with penalty or interest to December 31, 1931, under existing laws and contracts shall be paid in such annual installments as the Secretary of the Interior may fix.

SEC. 7. Any irrigation district, water users' association, or other water users' organization which has contracted to pay construction charges and which is not in arrears for more than one calendar year in the payment of any construction, operation, and maintenance, or other charge due by it to the United States may, at its option, deliver or authorize the delivery of water during the years 1932 and 1933 to water users who may be more than one year in arrears in the payment of charges or assessments due from such landowner or water user to the district or association.

SEC. 8. In the case of any irrigation district, water users' organization, or individual, receiving credits on account of power profits or other revenues under the provisions of subsections I and/or J, section 4, act of December 5, 1924 (43 Stat. 703), or any other act of Congress, when any extension is granted as provided in section 1, 2, or 4 the amount of such credits shall be deducted from the amount of any payment so extended: Provided, That the provisions of this section shall not apply to power profits or other revenues derived from works not constructed at the expense of the United States. The credits, if any, in excess of the payment so extended shall be applied as now provided by law and contract. Acceptance of the provisions of this act shall operate as a waiver of any law and/or contract providing for application of credits differing from that in this section prescribed.

SEC. 9. Collections of construction charges for the calendar year 931 (which charges are subject to adjustment and are adjusted under sections 1, 2, and 4 of this act) and penalties and interest, if any, from water-users' organizations and individual water-right applications or landowners, heretofore made under existing contracts, plus interests on all amounts so collected at the rate of 6 per cent per annum, shall be credited upon the succeeding payments as they become due, including operation and maintenance charges.

SEC. 10. That the act of June 25, 1910, entitled "An act to authorize advances to the reclamation fund, and for the issue and disposal of certificates of indebtedness in reimbursement therefor, and for other purposes," as amended, and the act of March 3, 1931 (46 Stat. 1507), are hereby amended so as to provide that payments in reimbursement of moneys so advanced under these acts and not heretofore repaid shall be made by transfer annually from the reclamation fund to the general funds of the Treasury beginning July 1, 1935.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Wyoming whether the bill makes other changes in existing law as applicable to irrigation projects than merely to postpone the payment of the amounts due under projects?

Mr. CAREY. Mr. President, the only other change is that the bill postpones the time of repayment for two years of moneys borrowed from the Treasury for reclamation projects. Last year there was a loan of $500,000 which was to be repaid, and that was put over for two years, in the form of a moratorium granted by the Congress.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, this bill would afford relief to a large number of settlers under irrigation projects. I understand it is not objected to by the department. In effect, it grants a moratorium to many people, many of whom, I happen to know of my own knowledge, are absolutely unable to pay and who will lose their farms unless something of this kind is done. I hope there will be no objection to it.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I have not had time to go carefully into the provisions of the bill. It appeals to me as a rather wise provision to make, but I do wish to make one observation in connection with it.

As I understand, this bill is for the purpose of relieving farmers on irrigated lands from the payment of certain rental charges. We have pending also a bill, which I do not believe has been reported yet from the committee, providing that in the case of farm loans which were made last year and are due at a given time, some of them probably past due now, the borrowers shall be granted an extension. I desire to have that bill considered.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. TRAMMELL. Certainly.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. My recollection is that such a provision was contained in a bill introduced by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] which passed the Senate some days ago.

Mr. TRAMMELL. When we had a call of the calendar?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Yes.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I was specially interested in that measure and am glad to know that action had been taken on it.

Mr. CAREY. The bill now before the Senate relates only to construction.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, may I inquire of the Senator from Wyoming how many people are involved?

Mr. CAREY. There are some 165,000 people who live on the projects. There are about 45,000 farms under the projects.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator from Wyoming a question. I understand that the bill simply grants an extension, but it does not cancel the obligation?

Mr. CAREY. It defers the payments to the end of the time of the contract when they are payable.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. But it does not tend to relieve anyone of the obligation.

Mr. CAREY. It does not cancel any debt.

Mr. GORE. I wanted to be sure of that.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REGULATIONS FOR LIGHTER SERVICE

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, because of the necessity for early action upon a particular bill, Order of Business No. 235, the bill (S. 2883) prescribing regulations for carrying on the business of lighter service, and so forth, concerning which I am certain there is not the slightest objection, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to its consideration at this time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Let the bill be read for the information of the Senate.

The Chief Clerk read the bill (S. 2883) prescribing regulations for carrying on the business of lighter service from many of the ports of the United States to stationary ships or barges located offshore, and for the purpose of promoting the safety of navigation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from California?

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I ask that the bill may remain on the calendar for the present.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection is made.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I wish to reassure the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] and others that there will be a call of the calendar to-morrow.

Mr. JOHNSON. Very well. I thank the Senator from Oregon.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. McNARY. I move that the Senate adjourn, the adjournment being until 12 o'clock noon to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate (at 4 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m.) adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, February 24, 1932, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 23, 1932

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Heavenly Father, we pray in the name of Him who is chief among ten thousand and the One altogether lovely. His fidelity and true simplicity, the harmony of the elements of His character, His voice and life, these are the reasons that His holy name floats through all periods of time. May we trust Him; may we accept Him. We thank Thee for the constancy of His example; namely, He went about doing good. There was not the tear of a child, the appeal of a woman, or the curse of a culprit that did not awaken the greatness of His soul and called forth His compassion. Father of mercies, may we harken unto His teaching: "Cast thy bread upon the waters and thou shalt find it after many days." Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

GEORGE WASHINGTON, THE STATESMAN

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting an address which I delivered last night before the New England Society on George Washington the Statesman.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD I include the following address which I delivered on Monday, February 22, before the New England Society of Washington, on the subject "George Washington, the Statesman":

We meet to-night to celebrate the two hundredth anniversary of the birth of the greatest of all American statesmen, the Father of Our Country and the inspired builder of the American Republic. George Canning, Prime Minister of England, who died in 1827, said of George Washington: "He was a man in whom the elements seemed so blended that nature might have stood up to all the world and owned him as her work. His fame, bound to no country, will be confined to no age."

In 1842, when a Member of Congress, Abraham Lincoln was asked to deliver an address at Springfield, Ill., on the one hundred and tenth anniversary of the birth of Washington. On that occasion our martyred President used these words: "Washington is the mightiest name of earth—long since mightiest in the cause of civil liberty; still mightiest in moral reformation. On that name a eulogy is expected. It can not be. To add brightness to the sun or glory to the name of Washington is alike impossible. Let none attempt it. In solemn awe pronounce the name and in its naked, deathless splendor leave it shining on."

With these words of Lincoln in my mind it is with much apprehension that I now attempt to address you briefly on the subject of George Washington, the statesman. We all know, however, that a statesman is one skilled in the science of government, a leader of distinguished ability. Such a man was Washington. After the War of the Revolution, he welded together the thirteen States as one united people. He was president of the Federal Convention in 1787, and through his splendid efforts the Constitution was ratified. The fundamental principles which he advocated are found in the Constitution itself and in the legislation proposed to Congress by him during his two terms as President. He worked incessantly to promote the objects of the Constitution, to establish a united nation, promote the welfare of all the people, and secure the real blessings of liberty.

He realized fully the importance of a fair and impartial judiciary, and to him the temples of justice were always sacred. In the appointment of the members of his first Cabinet and of the judiciary, he showed the true qualities of a great statesman. It has been well said that "he sought for men fit for offices; not for offices which might suit men."

During both of Washington's terms as President he acted as a true statesman in all matters relating to the public debt, national credit, agriculture, industry, commerce, navigation, and national defense. He always showed great solicitude for the preservation of the Union, and was a real statesman in all his actions designed to protect the integrity of the Union.

The Father of Our Country always advised us to concentrate our affections on our own Nation and to maintain an attitude of absolute impartiality toward foreign nations. He saw the ever-present dangers of alliances with foreign governments, and repeatedly warned against partiality for or hatred toward other nations.

In conclusion let me call your attention to the outstanding trait in the character of this great man whose memory we honor to-night, namely, his strong belief that religion and morality are the indispensable supports of all true government. In his famous Farewell Address, which will live for all time as a masterpiece of logic, patriotism, and statesmanship, he said: "Of all the dispositions and habits, which lead to political prosperity, religion and morality are indispensable supports. In vain would that man claim the tribute of patriotism, who would labor to subvert these great pillars of human happiness, these firmest props of the duties of men and citizens. The mere politician, equally with the pious man, ought to respect and to cherish them. A volume could not trace all their connections with private and public felicity. Let it simply be asked, Where is the security for property, for reputation, for life, if the sense of religious obligation desert the oaths, which are the instruments of investigation in courts of justice? And let us with caution indulge the supposition, that morality can be maintained without religion. Whatever may be conceded to the influence of refined education on minds of peculiar structure, reason and experience both forbid us to expect that national morality can prevail in exclusion of religious principle."

One hundred years ago to-day another great American, distinguished lawyer, orator, and statesman from my own State of New Hampshire, Daniel Webster, delivered a speech in this city on the character of George Washington. He concluded his address as follows: "A hundred years hence other disciples of Washington will celebrate his birth with no less of sincere admiration than we now commemorate it. When they shall meet as we now meet to do themselves and him that honor, so surely as they shall see the blue summits of his native mountains rise in the horizon, so surely as they shall behold the river on whose banks he lived and on whose bank he rests still flowing on toward the sea, so surely may they see as we now see the flag of the Union floating on the top of the Capitol; and then, as now, may the sun in his course visit no land more free, more happy, more lovely than this our own country!"

Again, this same Webster spoke words which best express the thoughts that were undoubtedly ever present in the mind of Washington: "When my eyes shall be turned for the last time to behold the sun in heaven, may I not see him shining upon the broken and disordered fragments of a once glorious Union, on States dissevered, discordant, and belligerent; on a land rent with civil feuds, or drenched, it may be, in fraternal blood. Let my last feeble and lingering glance rather behold the gorgeous ensign of this glorious Republic, now known and honored throughout all the world, still full high advanced, its arms and trophies streaming in their original luster, not a single star erased or obscured or a single stripe polluted; bearing for its motto no such miserable interrogatory as, What is all this worth? or those other words of delusion and folly, Liberty first and Union afterwards; but everywhere spread all over in characters of living light, blazing on all its ample folds as they float over the sea and over the land that other sentiment dear to every true American heart, Liberty and Union now and forever, one and inseparable."

These words of Webster most adequately express our sentiments to-day in doing fitting honor to the memory of George Washington, Father of our Country, and the greatest statesman of them all.

IF WASHINGTON WERE HERE

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend in the RECORD a speech made by the Commissioner from the Philippines, Hon. CAMILO OSIAS, before the Maryland branch of the Sons of the American Revolution in Baltimore last evening.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address delivered by Hon. CAMILO OSIAS, Resident Commissioner from the Philippines, at the dinner given in commemoration of the two hundredth anniversary of Washington's birthday, February 22, 1932, by the Maryland Society Sons of the American Revolution, Baltimore, Md.:

While listening to the all too generous remarks of the genial toastmaster I recalled the story I heard some years ago while traveling in the Far East. It is about an Englishman who was visiting China for the first time. In the course of a sight-seeing trip he chanced to enter a Chinese cemetery, where he saw what to him was a unique sight. It was the sight of a number of Chinese engaged in the time-honored custom of spreading expensive foods and elaborately prepared dishes over the graves of their forefathers. The Englishman approached one Chinese and said, "You must be foolish. Why do you waste all this food over the graves of your dead? You know they can't eat." The Chinaman replied, "You, too, are foolish. Why do you waste flowers and roses over the graves of your dead? You know they can't smell."

I rather like this gathering. I think the people here are wiser and more practical than the Englishman or the Chinese referred to in the story. You offer a man food and bouquet in the form of a good introduction before he is too far gone to appreciate those things.

You have honored me beyond my just deserts by choosing me as the guest of an organization so patriotic and as your speaker on an occasion so historic. I think I owe my presence here to the president of this Society of the Sons of the American Revolution, Mr. Sappington, and to my colleague Congressman LINTHICUM, the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, whom we all hold in high esteem in the House of Representatives.

Perhaps these gentlemen need some justification for their invitation in the name of the society. I am wondering if the words of commendation of me were not uttered in part for their protection. In further extenuation of their act I might cite one credential, my appointment by the Governor General, with the consent of the Philippine Senate, as "special commissioner to represent the government of the Philippine Islands on the United States Commission for the Celebration of the Two Hundredth Anniversary of the Birth of George Washington, created by joint resolution of Congress approved December 2, 1924."

In fulfillment of my duties as a representative of my country in the commission, I recommended that Philippine organizations and institutions, especially the schools, colleges, and universities, take part in the bicentennial celebration, holding appropriate exercises and studying the life and character of the great American liberator. February 22 is observed in every city and town of the Philippines. The enthusiastic participation of Filipinos in its observance proves that as a people we are identified with the fundamental ideals and the enduring principles of the Father of this Republic, whom Americans rightly look upon as "first in war, first in peace, and first in the hearts of his countrymen."

Lovers of liberty everywhere this day commemorate the birth of a man who is truly great and immortal.

José Rizal, the greatest not only of the Filipinos but of the whole Malayan race, the hero and martyr who was made to pay the supreme price of freedom in 1896, recognized Washington's greatness and referred to him as "that great man who has not his equal in this century." In the words of General Hamilton, "The voice of praise would in vain endeavor to exalt a name unrivaled in the lists of true glory."

Among Americans it would be inexcusable presumption on my part to relate biographical incidents or dwell upon the thrilling episodes of Washington's eventful life. This has been adequately done by speakers and writers far better qualified to do justice to a figure which shall ever tower in any age. It is permissible, however, for me to say that to all, irrespective of race or nationality, Washington has a mighty appeal because as a boy he was bright and industrious, as a man he was brave and true, as a leader he was courageous and persistent, as a functionary he was efficient and farseeing, as a citizen he was upright and loving. Washington was in every respect exemplary. His love of country, of humanity, and of God influenced his every conduct. His was a unified life piloted by high ideals and steeped in noble principles.

"Statesman, soldier, patriot, sage, reformer of creeds, teacher of truth and justice, achiever and preserver of liberty—the first of men, founder and savior of his country, father of his people—this is he, solitary and unapproachable in his grandeur." Happy and glorious America that gave Washington to the world!

I have assiduously sought to inform myself of the life and deeds of this great statesman and study his character and conduct, knowing that they would be a safe guide in my labors for the liberation of my own Philippines beloved. I have pondered over the thoughts which he bequeathed as a precious legacy to succeeding generations succinctly summarized in his immortal Farewell Address. I think Washington's political philosophy is epitomized in that document. I have long looked upon it as his last political will and testament.

The American Republic which he brought into being formed his chief theme and main concern. With what fervor and earnestness Washington must have penned these words:

"I shall carry it with me to my grave as a strong incitement to unceasing vows that heaven may continue to you the choicest tokens of its beneficence; that your union and brotherly affection may be perpetual; that the free Constitution, which is the work of your hands, may be sacredly maintained; that its administration in every department may be stamped with wisdom and virtue; that, in fine, the happiness of the people of these States, under the auspices of liberty, may be made complete by so careful a preservation and so prudent a use of this blessing as will acquire to them the glory of recommending it to the applause, the affection, and adoption of every nation which is yet a stranger to it."

I hope you will indulge me as I address myself briefly to what I think Washington would do if he were here. I shall select a few of his outstanding principles and point out their application to contemporary problems affecting particularly the relations between the people of the United States and the people of the Philippine Islands.

One outstanding virtue which dominated Washington's life was patriotism. English in his ancestry he was not content that the land of his nativity should be a perpetual dependency of the mother country. He sought and labored that he and his fellow citizens may have a country of their own distinct and self-governing, free and independent. The crowning joy of his life must have been the consciousness that he risked all that he had and all that he was that that dream might come true.

He realized that a free country was essential to the development of the highest faculties and attributes of its citizens; that there must be a common country for which individuals feel a mutual loyalty. This patriotic ideal he sought to convey to his fellow countrymen of his generation and posterity. "Citizens, by birth or choice, of a common country," he said, "that country has a right to concentrate your affections. The name of American, which belongs to you in your national capacity, must always exalt the just pride of patriotism more than any appellation derived from local discriminations."

From this we see that Washington desired that the America he loved should be the object of supreme affections on the part of Americans. It occurs to me that if Washington were here, he would be deeply sympathetic with the aspirations of the 13,000,000 souls across the sea who have fought, labored, and sacrificed that they, too, may have a country of their own, independent and free.

Under the dependent status of the Philippines, the Filipinos are neither citizens nor subjects. They are neither foreigners nor aliens. No wonder they covet their independence so that the name of "Filipino" may belong to them in their national capacity; so that they may derive a just pride of patriotism from the consciousness of a common country; so that they may be citizens of a republic with a right to concentrate the people's affections. Once we have a country of our own, self-governing and self-directing, we shall the better be able to foster sane and humanized patriotism.

George Washington was a great believer in the principle of union. He enjoined his fellow citizens to preserve union. These were his words of advice, the fruit of long and mature reflection: "While, then, every part of our country thus feels an immediate and particular interest in union, all the parts combined can not fail to find in the united mass of means and efforts greater strength, greater resource, proportionably greater security from external danger, a less frequent interruption of their peace by foreign nations; and, what is of inestimable value, they must derive from union an exemption from those broils and wars between themselves which so frequently afflict neighboring countries not tied together by the same governments, which their own rival ships alone would be sufficient to produce, but which opposite foreign alliances, attachments, and intrigues would stimulate and embitter."

If Washington were here how he would delight in witnessing the wonderful spectacle of the American people compact and united! But I believe he would not only rejoice in the union of his fellow citizens but would find satisfaction in seeing that the Filipino people are likewise united, conscious of a common past and a common destiny.

The Filipinos are racially homogeneous. They are essentially of Malayan stock.

The Filipinos possess a wonderful religious solidarity. Ninety-one per cent are Christians.

In their desire for independence there is substantial unanimity. They are exempt from those broils and wars between themselves afflicting neighboring countries. There are no alliances, entanglements, and intrigues that embitter their relationships.

In the revolution of 1896 the Filipino people were united in their desire to throw off the Spanish yoke. They were united in establishing the Philippine Republic. They were united in approving a constitution for that republic vesting the power and authority in the people.

The Filipinos have been united in laboring for independence in the domain of peace for the last 30 years. Impartial observers recognize the unity of my people in their passionate desire to be freed from outside tutelage. Conscious of my responsibility, I say without fear of contradiction to the American people that my people are united in their demand for the early grant of their independence which America promised.

George Washington was not only an apostle of union; he was against sectionalism. This principle is cherished by the Filipinos. They heed the injunction of America's first President.

In the Philippines to-day there are no local interests or sectional views that divide the people; they are vigilant ever for "whatever estranges, whatever divides." Manila, the capital of the islands, in their national life, is a common center of gravity. Their central government has the support and loyalty of all the inhabitants. They are strong and solid against all efforts tending toward the dismemberment of their territorial integrity. Under a common government and a common flag there will be a new incentive for them to preserve the union and to guard against all sectionalism.

George Washington believed in the Constitution. None among the living will ever know the full extent of his powerful influence in the shaping of that document which an English statesman pronounced as "the most wonderful work ever struck off at a given time by the brain and purpose of man." In his celebrated address, Washington urged respect for the Constitution, deeming it essential to "the efficacy and permanency of the Union." "Obedience to it" he said, "is sacredly obligatory upon all."

Holding these views as he did, if Washington were here, I believe he would be happy in the knowledge that the Filipinos, following peaceful means and constitutional methods, are earnestly petitioning the Government and people of the United States to grant them the authority to hold a constitutional convention and fashion a constitution of their own which shall be the expression of their combined talent, genius, and wisdom. He would rejoice that there are measures pending in both Houses of the present Congress awaiting early action designed to effect our national emancipation.

George Washington was an apostle of peace. Achieving liberty by means of the sword as a measure of last resort, the major purpose of his life was to see that liberty may endure through the cultivation of the arts of peace. The whole spirit of his life and conduct, the very core of the principles he most valued, breathes his love of peace.

He warned his people against "overgrown military establishments" deeming them "inauspicious to liberty" under any form of government. Here is a principle which the whole world would do well to heed. If he were here, I am certain he would give sanction to disarmament conferences and effective movements for world peace. I believe he would give his blessing to the efforts of my people to achieve their independence absolutely through the medium of peace.

Washington favored the development of "institutions for the general diffusion of knowledge" and looked upon religion and morality as indispensable supports in the life of men and nations. If he were living, I am confident he would be pleased with the Filipino people because of their passionate devotion to education, to morality, to religion, a passion so strong equaled only by their devotion to freedom.

He advised extending the commercial relations of the United States, but with as "little political connection as possible." Couple with this his historic warning against entangling alliances, and I believe you will agree with me when I say that if Washington were here he would gladly accord the Filipino people the right to self-determination, severing our political ties and thereby strengthening your commercial relations not alone with the Philippines but with the whole Orient based upon the solid and lasting foundations of good will, understanding, and friendship.

Then, of course, the whole world knows that George Washington was an apostle of human liberty. Thirteen million Filipinos rejoice with the Americans this day not only because of the different rôles that he played so magnificently and the contributions he made so profusely but chiefly because of the majestic and imposing figure of Washington as a liberator. As such he is admired and respected throughout the world. As such he will live throughout the ages.

As a student, as a schoolman, as a university administrator, as a public servant, I have followed the career of Washington. I recognize him as great in ever so many fields of human endeavor, but I admire and respect him most because of what he risked, of what he did, of what he sacrificed for the sacred cause of liberty. He has been my constant inspiration in my own modest labors here and in my own country for our freedom and independence. I seek ever to be guided by his spirit and by his example.

My people have faith in the American people because they believe Washington is the incarnation of human freedom and that the American people are imbued with the same spirit that animated him in life. They are confident that if Washington were here he would not delay unnecessarily the grant of the boon of that ideal which he exalted above property and life, above everything worth while on earth—the ideal of liberty and independence.

Washington in person is not here, but a grateful people pause on this the two hundredth anniversary of his birth to reconsecrate themselves anew to the principles which have guided the triumphant course of this liberty-loving Republic. Washington is not here, I repeat, but his spirit is here. The Congress of the United States ordained the observance of the bicentennial celebration of the birth of Washington "that future generations of American citizens may live according to the example and precepts of his exalted life and character, and thus perpetuate the American Republic"; that this generation of American citizens may the better fulfill their obligations not only to themselves but to the benighted millions across the vast Pacific.

The present year is a mighty challenge to the 120,000,000 fellow citizens of Washington in continental United States. They owe a duty to themselves and to the 13,000,000 Filipinos who came under the stewardship of that starry banner which carried Washington from victory to victory even during the dark and dreary days of the American War of Independence. Conscious of the magnitude and multiplicity of your tasks, aware of the many problems confronting this Nation, I dare say that no single event during the bicentennial celebration would bring greater honor and glory to the Republic "conceived in liberty and dedicated to the proposition that all men are created equal" than the enactment of a law redeeming America's promise granting the Philippine Islands their independence. This act of justice would be highly pleasing to George Washington if he were here, knowing, as all of us do know, that his love of liberty was intertwined with every ligament of his all-encompassing heart, with every fiber of his whole being.

THE RULES

Mr. GREENWOOD, from the Committee on Rules, presented a privileged report on the following resolution (H. Res. 150), which was referred to the House Calendar and ordered printed:

House Resolution 150

Resolved, That clause 3 of Rule XIII be amended to read as follows:

"After a bill has been favorably reported and shall be upon either the House or Union Calendar any Member may file with the Clerk a notice that he desires such bill placed upon a special calendar to be known as the 'Consent Calendar.' On the first and third Mondays of each month, immediately after the reading of the Journal, the Speaker shall direct the Clerk to call the bills in numerical order which have been for three legislative days upon the 'Consent Calendar.' Should objection be made to the consideration of any bill so called it shall be carried over on the calendar without prejudice to the next day when the 'Consent Calendar' is again called, and if again objected to by three or more Members it shall immediately be stricken from the calendar, and shall not thereafter during the same session of that Congress be placed again thereon: Provided, That no bill shall be called twice on the same legislative day."

That clause 6 of Rule XXIV be amended to read as follows:

"On Saturday of each week after the disposal of such business on the Speaker's table as requires reference only, it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House to consider business on the Private Calendar. In the Committee of the Whole House the Chairman shall direct the Clerk to call the bills in numerical order that have been upon the Private Calendar for three legislative days. When the Clerk shall have read the bill the same shall be considered unless objection or reservation of objection is made to immediate consideration. Should objection or reservation of objection be made there shall be 10 minutes' general debate to be divided, 5 minutes controlled by the Member offering the objection or reservation and 5 minutes controlled by the chairman of the committee reporting the bill, or in his absence by any Member supporting the bill. If, after such debate, three objections are not forthcoming the bill shall be considered under the 5-minute rule: Provided, however, That the total debate under the 5-minute rule shall not exceed 20 minutes. After the debate hereinbefore referred to, or when the bill is first called, if objection is made by three Members to the consideration of the bill, then the same shall be passed over and carried to a list designated as 'deferred.' It shall be in order for the bills on the 'Deferred List' to have the first call in their numerical order when the Private Calendar is called on the last Saturday of each month. At this time the bills on the 'Deferred List' shall be considered under the general rules of the Committee of the Whole House with 10 minutes' general debate to be divided equally, with 5 minutes controlled by the chairman of the committee reporting the bill or other Member supporting the bill and 5 minutes controlled by any Member objecting or opposing the bill. After the debate the bill shall be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule: Provided, however, That the total debate under the 5-minute rule shall not exceed 20 minutes. If, however, after such consideration the Committee of the Whole House acts on the bill adversely, it shall be laid aside until the committee arises, whereupon it shall be reported back to the House with the adverse recommendation. Any bill under this rule reported back to the House with an adverse recommendation shall automatically be recommitted to the committee reporting it, and said bill shall not again be reported during the same Congress."

CONSOLIDATION OF WAR AND NAVY DEPARTMENTS

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for not exceeding seven minutes on a matter that is more or less personal.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, on January 5 I introduced a bill in the House providing for the consolidation of the Army and the Navy under a department to be known as the Department of National Defense. Since January 5 the Committee on Expenditures, to which that bill was referred, has been conducting extensive hearings. I have not, of course, the slightest criticism to offer of anyone. It has been my very earnest hope, as it has been the hope of many in the House who are interested in the passage of some such legislation, that the committee would conclude its hearings and make a report to the House of that bill so that it could be discussed upon the floor of the House.

There have been efforts, as I have said heretofore, to defeat that bill in committee and to prevent its being brought into the sunlight so that we could have what might be termed a public discussion of it, and not only you and I who are not members of that committee but the public at large have an opportunity to judge as to its merits.

Last Saturday it was expected by some of us that the committee would vote upon that measure, and I may say I confidently expected it would be favorably reported for consideration by the House. However, it was referred to a subcommittee, and the press services carried a statement, which was published over the country, assigning the reasons as to why it went to this subcommittee. I have no criticism of the press services for what they stated with reference to those reasons, but I noticed in one of those statements it was said that the chairman of the committee, my very warm personal friend, Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri, had said it was referred to a subcommittee because the bill conflicted with present law and the subcommittee was expected to see what could be done toward making it conform with existing law and make a report. I am very sure the gentleman from Missouri was unintentionally, of course, misquoted, because the whole object of the bill was to change existing law and, of course, it conflicted with existing law.

Another statement made was that the bill was poorly drawn. I took that somewhat as a reflection upon me as its introducer. However, that bill has the O. K. of the legislative reference bureau of this House, for which we appropriate money every year to assist Members in preparing bills of a difficult nature, and I do not mind telling you that it was drawn by the legislative reference service at my request. [Applause.]

But I submit that the legislative reference bureau, which has in it, as you gentlemen who have had experience know, men who are competent and who have made a study of the preparation of legislation, certainly are better prepared to draft a bill of this sort than any of the Members of the House. It was for this reason, and because of the importance of the legislation, that I asked the legislative reference bureau to prepare the bill, and I introduced it as they handed it to me.

Now, so much for the fact it is "poorly drawn." I think the mere statement I have made will serve to contradict any such statement that may have been made to the contrary. I have said on the floor of this House several times—and I say it with all the earnestness of my nature—there has not been a bill introduced in this House which, if it is passed, will do more to conserve the public money and save millions of dollars than this particular bill or some bill of this particular kind, and all I ask the committee to do——

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS. In a moment. I am not speaking of the gentleman from Missouri, because he is heartily in favor of the bill and has done everything he could to bring it out.

All I ask this committee to do is to report the bill out and give the Members of the House an opportunity to pass one way or the other upon it. I am willing to let it take its chances, of course, but I do not want Army officers and I do not want Navy officers and I do not want Secretaries of War and of Navy, who are not elected by the people and who owe no responsibilty to the people for the condition of our Treasury, by their influence to smother it in committee and prevent its discussion and its consideration in the light of day. [Applause.]

I have been taught from my youth up that the truth never hurts a righteous cause, and all I want, I repeat, is an opportunity to get the bill up on the floor of the House and have it given fair consideration by the House.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes more.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

Mr. BYRNS. Why are these interested parties seeking to smother it? Why are they seeking to keep it in the files of the committee? Why are these gentlemen working to bring about this delay? It is in order, of course, to defeat the bill.

I hope that this subcommittee will present the bill back to the full committee and that the full committee will report it.

I may say that it is reported in the papers that a minority member of that committee is heartily in favor of either that bill or a bill of a similar nature, and I have understood there are one or two other members of the minority in favor of it, but the opposition—and I am speaking plainly—comes from a few Democrats over on this side who, notwithstanding the long delay, were not ready to vote for it, and thereby forced it to be referred to a subcommittee last Saturday.

The bill has the earnest support of the great Speaker of this House. [Applause.] It was introduced after consultation with him, and he has declared repeatedly that this bill or a bill of a similar nature ought to be passed. I am not putting it on partisan grounds, but I do say that the Democrats on that committee ought to be willing with respect to this bill, which has the official sanction of the official leaders of the House, to permit it to come out and be voted upon.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Will the gentleman now yield?

Mr. BYRNS. I yield.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I want to say to the gentleman from Tennessee that there were two such bills before the committee; one of them was also introduced in the last Congress. The gentleman's bill was introduced in this Congress. The committee held hearings, and at the conclusion of the hearings we considered the bill in executive session. The claim was made by some gentlemen on the other side of the House who purposed to support the legislation that there was something missing in the gentleman's bill. They wanted it considered to determine if there were certain paragraphs that should be inserted in the gentleman's bill. The committee voted to send the bill to a subcommittee—not for the purpose of tearing it apart, but to give these questions consideration—and then to report it back to the full committee.

Mr. BYRNS. The gentleman was quoted——

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. One minute. The subcommittee was appointed yesterday. It will meet at 2 o'clock to-morrow afternoon, and I hope the subcommittee will report the bill back to the full committee by Saturday; and if it does, I hope the committee will report it to the floor. What more can the gentleman ask? Far be it from me to pass on the phraseology of the gentleman's bill. No one who knows him would reflect on his outstanding ability. Suggestions were made at the hearings and should be considered.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have three minutes more.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Does the gentleman from Tennessee desire an extension of time?

Mr. BYRNS. I would like to proceed for two minutes more. I do not want to prolong the discussion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to proceed for two additional minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS. I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. Does the gentleman from Tennessee know of a more arrogant, pernicious lobby anywhere in this Capitol than that of the Army and Navy League?

Mr. BYRNS. I am not going to characterize it in exactly the language the gentleman from Texas has used, but I will say that there is not a more powerful lobby that appears here in the Capitol than has appeared against this particular bill.

Mr. BLANTON. I want to say that in past years they have threatened some Members of Congress with annihilation if they opposed their plans.

Mr. BYRNS. I only rose to correct this impression that had been created about this particular bill and to express the hope that the committee will give the Members of the House an opportunity to discuss the measure on the floor of the House. That is certainly a reasonable request. [Applause.]

Mr. BLANTON. I call the gentleman's attention to the threat they made on Tom Sisson, of Mississippi, because he denounced them on the floor for lobbying, and they threatened him that they would go into his district and beat him for reelection. During a colloquy that ensued here on the floor I asked Mr. Sisson whether the Army and Navy were running this Government, and he replied that he believed they were, however much he hated to admit it.

GEORGE WASHINGTON—OPINIONS OF GREAT MEN ABOUT WASHINGTON AND HIS LIFE AS A MASON

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting a speech delivered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY] in Alexandria last night.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I ask permission to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting the address of Congressman ALLEN T. TREADWAY, of Massachusetts, at the annual celebration of Alexandria-Washington Lodge, No. 22, A. F. and A. M., on Monday, February 22, 1932, at Alexandria, Va.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the matter was ordered printed, as follows:

Most worshipful grand master of Virginia, worshipful master of Alexandria-Washington Lodge, distinguished guests, ladies, and brethern, to follow those who have already addressed you is an unenviable privilege. You have had words of Masonic wisdom from the grand master of Virginia, you have had a most inspiring address by Bishop Freeman, and in addition you have had a message from overseas. I feel that the remarks of the last speaker, Minister Davila, of Rumania, bring us a message of special interest. He has shown us that the spirit of Washington and the characteristics which made him the greatest man from his day to ours have impressed themselves upon other peoples and nations and have engendered in them an admiration for the Father of Our Country despite the lack of patriotic inspiration which enhances our own love of Washington.

We may also envy Minister Davila for his linguistic accomplishments. Brother Davila apologized for any errors in English he might make, saying he had had no knowledge of our language when he came here to represent his country two years ago. Let me assure him that many of us Yankees, who may know very little of other languages, envy him his power of expression and command of beautiful diction. We are proud to have him with us not only as the representative of his country but as the bearer of a Masonic message.

It seems almost presuming for anyone other than a historian or litterateur to speak about the Father of Our Country. From the beginning of the history of this Nation no one person has been more written about, more highly praised, and more discussed than has George Washington. Therefore, to expect from a busy man like myself anything original or unique upon the subject is entirely out of the question. Particularly at this time it is impossible to present new views or any special information about this great man.

The George Washington Bicentennial Commission, through its historian, Dr. Albert Bushnell Hart, has gathered all available information regarding the outstanding events and achievements of Washington. This material, which has been published in the form of books and pamphlets, is so complete that it is practically impossible to offer anything entirely new in regard to the life of the first President of our country.

I shall, therefore, confine myself largely to quotations from distinguished speakers, historians, and statesmen, realizing that their words are much more appropriate in commemoration of the life of Washington than any composition of mine could be. To these I shall add some references to the life of Washington as a Mason.

In December, 1924, Congress passed a joint resolution providing for the celebration of the two hundredth anniversary of the birth of George Washington. It was not proposed that there should be a world's fair or exposition. Instead of holding a celebration in any one place and asking people to attend it, it was planned that the celebration would be taken to the homes, schools, churches, patriotic and fraternal groups all over the Nation. That plan is now being carried out, and from now until November, particularly on holidays, these celebrations will take place from the Atlantic to the Pacific and from Canada to the Gulf. It is a spiritual celebration, in the hearts of all Americans.

In the joint resolution of Congress it was provided that the plan for a bicentennial celebration should be promulgated to the American people through an address to be delivered at a joint session of the Senate and House of Representatives, held on February 22, 1927.

The proceedings were held in the House Chamber and were opened with prayer by the Chaplain of the House, the Rev. James Shera Montgomery. I quote the following from his invocation:

"May we feel the resistless spirit of him whom we gratefully call 'the Father of His Country.' It was his balanced intellect, understanding, and his greatness of soul that steadied and preserved the infant Government against peril and prejudice. Be Thou the guardian of those principles which he so thoroughly incarnated. May they always be ours to cherish and to defend."

The address of the day was then delivered by the President of the United States, Calvin Coolidge. Just a word or two from his remarks:

"Washington has come to personify the American Republic. * * * When we realize what it meant to take thirteen distracted Colonies, impoverished, envious, and hostile, and weld them into an orderly federation under the authority of a central government, we can form some estimate of the influence of this great man. * * *

"We have seen many soldiers who have left behind them little but the memory of their conflicts; but among all the victors the power to establish among a great people a form of self-government which the test of experience has shown will endure was bestowed upon Washington, and Washington alone. Many others have been able to destroy. He was able to construct. That he had around him many great minds does not detract from his glory. His was the directing spirit, without which there would have been no independence, no Union, no Constitution, and no Republic. His ways were the ways of truth. He built for eternity. His influence grows. His stature increases with the increasing years. In wisdom of action, in purity of character, he stands alone. We can not yet estimate him. We can only indicate our reverence for him and thank Divine Providence which sent him to inspire and serve his fellow men."

On the second day of the present month President Hoover issued a proclamation calling attention to the two hundredth anniversary of the birth of Washington and inviting the people throughout the country to organize themselves in their respective communities to do honor to the memory of the first President during the period from February 22 to Thanksgiving Day. In this proclamation President Hoover said:

"The happy opportunity has come to our generation to demonstrate our gratitude and our obligation to George Washington by fitting celebration of the two hundredth anniversary of his birth.

"To contemplate his unselfish devotion to duty, his courage, his patience, his genius, his statesmanship, and his accomplishments for his country and the world refreshes the spirit, the wisdom, and the patriotism of our people.

"Therefore, I, Herbert Hoover, President of the United States of America, acting in accord with the purposes of the Congress, do invite all our people to organize themselves through every community and every association to do honor to the memory of Washington during the period from February 22 to Thanksgiving Day."

A hundred years ago to-day a public dinner, commemorating the one hundredth anniversary of the birth of Washington, was held in the city of Washington and was attended by Members of the Senate and House and others from various parts of the country.

Daniel Webster, then a Senator from Massachusetts, delivered the principal address. Among other things he said:

"We are met to testify our regard for him whose name is intimately blended with whatever belongs most essentially to the prosperity, the liberty, the free institutions, and the renown of our country. That name was of power to rally a nation, in the hour of thick-thronging public disasters and calamities; that name shone amid the storm of war, a beacon light to cheer and guide the country's friends; it flamed, too, like a meteor, to repel her foes. That name, in the days of peace, was a lodestone, attracting to itself a whole people's confidence, a whole people's love, and the whole world's respect. That name, descending with all time, spreading over the whole earth, and uttered in all the languages belonging to the tribes and races of men, will forever be pronounced with affectionate gratitude by everyone in whose breast there shall arise an aspiration for human rights and human liberty. * * *

"In the cities and in the villages, in the public places and in the family circles, among all ages and sexes, gladdened voices to-day bespeak grateful hearts and a freshened recollection of the virtues of the Father of His Country. And it will be so, in all time to come, so long as public virtue is itself an object of regard."

That great American, Abraham Lincoln, speaking on the one hundred and tenth anniversary of the birth of Washington, said:

"On that name a eulogy is expected. It can not be. To add brightness to the sun or glory to the name of Washington is alike impossible. Let none attempt it. In solemn awe pronounce the name and in its naked, deathless splendor leave it shining on."

President William McKinley, in an address at the Washington memorial services held at Mount Vernon on December 14, 1899, said:

"The Nation needs at this moment the help of his wise example. In dealing with our vast responsibilities we turn to him. We invoke the counsel of his life and character and courage. We summon his precepts that we may keep his pledges to maintain justice and law, education and morality, and civil and religious liberty in every part of our country, the new as well as the old."

Let me read you the tribute of the late Senator Henry Cabot Lodge in the last edition of his Life of Washington:

"There are but very few great men in history—and Washington was one of the greatest—whose declaration of principles and whose thoughts upon the policies of government have had such a continuous and unbroken influence as his have had upon a great people and through them upon the world. * * * His fame, his character, his sagacity, and his ardent patriotism will remain and be familiar to all Americans who love their country. * * *"

Further on he says:

"So it is with the wisdom of Washington, which comes to us across the century as clear and shining as it was in the days when his love for his country and his passion for America gave forth their last message to generations yet unborn."

Washington's outstanding characteristic was his spirit of humility. He was deeply grateful to his fellow countrymen for the opportunities which were given him to render public service. In his Farewell Address to the people he said:

"If benefits have resulted to our country from these services, let it always be remembered to your praise, and as an instructive example in our annals, that under circumstances in which the passions, agitated in every direction, were liable to mislead amidst appearances sometimes dubious, vicissitudes of fortune often discouraging—in situations in which not infrequently want of success has countenanced the spirit of criticism—the constancy of your support was the essential prop of the effort and a guarantee of the plans by which they were effected. Profoundly penetrated with this idea, I shall carry it with me to the grave as a strong incitement to unceasing vows that heaven may continue to you the choicest tokens of its beneficence—that your union and brotherly affection may be perpetual—that the free Constitution, which is the work of your hands, may be sacredly maintained—that its administration in every department may be stamped with wisdom and virtue—that, in fine, the happiness of the people of these States, under the auspices of Liberty, may be made complete by so careful a preservation and so prudent a use of this blessing as will acquire to them the glory of recommending it to the applause, the affection, and adoption of every nation which is yet a stranger to it."

So from the far-seeing wisdom and foresight of Washington has grown a nation, based upon the principles he advocated, unsurpassed in world history. As it increases in strength and influence his name will likewise be the more enshrined in the hearts of countless thousands yet unborn who will revere him as "The Father of His County."

These brief references I have made prove that the American people have been true to the memory of Washington the man, the patriot, the general, and the President.

So far as I know, there was only one occasion when he acted in a dual capacity as President and as a Mason. This was at the laying of the corner stone of the Capitol on September 18, 1793. For a brief period the President of the United States became the grand master pro tempore of Maryland, laying the corner stone of the Capitol with the dignified rites of the order.

That this event has not been forgotten is evidenced by the exercises held on the one hundredth anniversary of that occasion. A few days ago it was my privilege to see the bronze tablet in the southeast corner—rather than the northeast—which was erected following the one hundredth anniversary exercises under President Grover Cleveland.

The inscription on the tablet reads as follows:

"Beneath this tablet the corner stone of the Capitol of the United States of America was laid by George Washington, first President, September 18, 1793. On the hundredth anniversary, in the year 1893, in presence of the Congress, the Executive, and the judiciary and a vast concourse of the grateful people of the District of Columbia commemorated the event."

President Cleveland, who acted as chairman of ceremonies, said in his address:

"Those who suppose that we are simply engaged in commemorating the beginning of a magnificent structure devoted to important public uses have overlooked the most useful and improving lesson of the hour. We do, indeed, celebrate the laying of a corner stone from which has sprung the splendid edifice whose grand proportions arouse the pride of every American citizen, but our celebration is chiefly valuable and significant because this edifice was designed and planned by great and good men as a place where the principles of a free representative government should be developed in patriotic legislation for the benefit of free people."

It is unfortunate from the sentimental point of view that the original corner stone laid by Washington is buried far below the present grade, so that, according to former Clerk William Tyler Page, it has not been seen for a long period of years.

The city of Washington itself is a perpetual memorial to the man whose name it bears. Located and designed by Major l'Enfant under Washington's guidance, it continues to grow in beauty and attractiveness, and every change that is made but adds to the honor we pay the founder of the city and of the Nation.

Originally the monolithic shaft arising in stately majesty for 555 feet was a silent monument to Washington. In later years, as great improvements have been made in the city, it would seem to me that every stone and every building speaks to his memory.

If Washington can now visualize the city of Washington, his modesty and humility in life might be overcome by a realization of what he did for future generations of American citizens. We are building a beautiful capital city worthy of the name it bears and the country that it typifies.

To-day we are especially proud of the new bridge recently completed, leading as it does to what will be the most beautiful memorial boulevard in the world. Millions of dollars have been expended for this most useful memorial. To-day thousands upon thousands have traversed the highway leading from the Capital City to Washington's former home and his tomb.

Let me pause to say that the congressional appropriation through which this beautiful boulevard was constructed was obtained by the influence and strenuous efforts of one of our former colleagues, the Hon. R. Walton Moore, who ably represented this section of Virginia in the National House of Representatives for several terms.

There is just one discordant note in my mind in this whole picture, and that is the fact that the world's greatest shrine, Mount Vernon, does not belong to the Nation which Washington founded. Last evening I attended the beautiful Wakefield masque, symbolic of the birth of Washington. Wakefield, where he was born, is a marvelous example of Government control and regulation. How much more in keeping would it be if Mount Vernon, too, were United States property.

Last spring a replica of Mount Vernon was made for the Paris Exposition. Strange, is it not, that this Government's exhibit at that exposition was a copy of something which is not its own property?

The patriotic women who have so carefully preserved Mount Vernon through a private organization could, in my opinion, show no greater patriotism than by cooperating with the Federal Government to the end that actual title to the property could be in the name of the United States.

At Shooters Hill, just at the outskirts of Alexandria, is being completed the Masons' own memorial to Brother Washington. Probably nine-tenths of the great body of Masons in this country have contributed to this structure, to which Alexandria-Washington Lodge will soon transfer the priceless relics now in its lodge room having to do with the life of Washington as a Mason and master of the lodge.

As the Washington Monument is a token of the love of citizens of this country for the memory of Washington, so is the memorial on Shooters Hill a token of the brotherly affection and respect of the Masons of this country for him.

So far I have referred to occasions where Washington was honored as a man, a patriot, a soldier, and a public servant.

Now let me recall to your memories a few of the outstanding events of his life as a Mason.

I say recall to your memories, because again there is embarrassment in any effort to offer anew any thoughts of Washington as a Mason to members of Alexandria-Washington Lodge.

In token of his early appreciation of the tenets of Masonry we have seen Washington an applicant for the degrees before his twenty-first birthday. Now and again question has been raised both as to the correctness of his initiation and the authenticity of his birth date. To-day it is well established that a candidate knocking at the door must have reached his twenty-first birthday, but if we look back over 175 years and realize that Masonry was then just taking root in this country it is very easy to understand that the by-laws of lodges were doubtless just in the making.

It is even more gratifying to appreciate that at that early age Washington had already been anxious to see the light. The lodge in Fredericksburg has the honor of having conferred upon Washington the three degrees of Masonry. It was located some 50 miles from his home. In later years scoffers at Masonry brought up the question of his nonattendance at regular communications, but we of to-day can appreciate the inconveniences of travel, which must have been connected with attendance.

I also believe a letter is in existence in which Washington makes reference to not having sat in a lodge for 30 years. This is readily explained when we recall that at one time there was a distinction between the provincial lodges of this country and the mother lodge of England.

However, to us Masons of to-day no defense of Washington or his Masonic career is needed. His entire life speaks louder than our words in conveying the acceptance on his part of the ideals and tenets of the ancient landmarks of the craft.

I delight in thinking of his humility. How well it is illustrated in the brief extract I read to you from his Farewell Address to the American people. Prepared over a period of years, evidently not certain in his own mind that it was a document worthy of publication, he handed it informally to a newspaper friend with the statement that if worth while it could be given out.

In this Farewell Address his effort was to have the people feel that they were responsible for his great victories and successes.

And so it was with his Masonic career. On June 23, 1777, representatives of five lodges of this State assembled at Williamsburg for the purpose of organizing a grand lodge. These delegates offered the office of grand master to Brother Washington, which he promptly declined, principally because he had never been master or warden of a chartered lodge.

With all due respect to Masons to-day, how many brethren would have declined such a great honor as that of being grand master?

It is also an established fact that Washington was twice asked to become general grand master, an office which he declined with modesty and humility. What might have been the outcome of his acceptance of such office on the history of Masonry in the United States is hard to conceive. We now have 49 grand jurisdictions dealing together in harmony and brotherly love. If a central body had been established, it could well have led to rivalry and dissensions, which would have been fatal to the wonderful growth of Masonry in this country.

A native-born Massachusetts citizen and associated with the Grand Lodge of Massachusetts for more than 25 years, I am sure you will pardon my natural pride in the relationship between our grand lodge and some of its distinguished officers and Brother Washington.

It is stated with authority that Thomas Oxnard, provisional grand master of Massachusetts under the jurisdiction of the Grand Lodge of England, issued the warrant under which the lodge at Fredericksburg, Va., was established, in which lodge Washington received his degrees.

In the proceedings of the Grand Lodge of Massachusetts, under date of March 13, 1797, a vote was recorded that the grand master of the State and other brethern should draft an address to Brother Washington on the occasion of his retiring from the Presidency. Other evidences of his relationship with the Grand Lodge of Massachusetts continue to the time of his death.

It is interesting to note that the grand master of Massachusetts at that time was one of our great Revolutionary War heroes, Paul Revere, whose famous ride through Concord and Lexington is one of the outstanding historical events of our country.

In no place has greater reverence been paid to Washington as a Mason than in the Grand Lodge of Massachusetts. Paul Revere was a metal worker and engraver. He made for the grand lodge an urn, in which was deposited a lock of Washington's hair, donated to our grand lodge by Brother Washington's widow.

There is no more impressive ceremony in any organization of which I have knowledge than that of transferring this urn from grand master to grand master. This is a part of the installation ceremonies, wherein the retiring grand master charges his successor with the careful preservation of this precious relic.

So to-night, coming from that jurisdiction, let me in my humble way add my word of thanksgiving as a Mason for the life of George Washington.

RADIO ADDRESSES OF HON. SOL. BLOOM, ASSOCIATE DIRECTOR UNITED STATES GEORGE WASHINGTON BICENTENNIAL COMMISSION

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD several speeches made by myself, and to include therein an article on the exact birthday of George Washington.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

The addresses are as follows:

MOTHER'S DAY PROGRAM IN CONNECTION WITH GEORGE WASHINGTON BICENTENNIAL CELEBRATION

[Broadcast from Washington, D. C., May 10, 1931]

To-day, throughout our country, we are celebrating Mother's Day.

Upon this beautiful and solemn anniversary our hearts respond to a common impulse of devotion. From many homes, from many varied occupations, from many conditions of life that occupy our daily thoughts, we experience to-day upon this sacred occasion the exaltation of the finest of human sentiments.

While we think of motherhood as universal, yet in each one of us there is treasured a shrine of love for that one being to whom we owe our individual homage—our mother.

The heroism of a mother's love—her distinct and individual influence—differs from anything else God ever thought of, for it fixes in permanent outline the future hope of us all.

The honoring of mothers is as old as the human race. We sometimes think of Mother's Day in our country as being something new, yet festivals and ceremonies of similar kind were common in the dawning period of our civilization. Long before the Christian era something closely corresponding to Mother's Day was introduced through Greece into Rome, where it was known as the Festival of Hilaria, and, appropriately enough, was a spring festival. At any rate, we can not claim monopoly of this fine and noble filial sentiment.

This afternoon there will be a ceremonial in beautiful Arlington Cemetery to honor motherhood, but more particularly to honor the motherhood which has laid its choicest sacrifices upon the altar of our country. The American War Mothers will assemble to commemorate those sacrifices and to rededicate our hearts to that transcendent patriotism which has found most appropriate expression in that organization.

As I contemplate the sacrifices and the sufferings of these and all other war mothers, I can not refrain from dwelling upon that first American war mother who gave her noble son to the service of his country.

Upon a beautiful monument in the city of Fredericksburg, Va., are carved these simple words, "Mary, the Mother of Washington." Beneath that monument lie the ashes of that remarkable woman who gave to us the rich heritage of our greatest American. It is to the mother of George Washington that this Nation owes its existence to-day as a land of liberty and of opportunity.

Not only did Mary, the mother of Washington, bring into the world a son of rare heredity and character but we know from research that from his infancy this boy was trained and taught in those high principles of truth, courage, and honor which equipped him perfectly for the great task to which he was to come.

Perhaps, had there been no George Washington, some other man would have arisen who could have carried forward the gigantic task of liberating our country and establishing our form of government. But the one thing we know is that George Washington did fulfill this destiny and that he could not have done so had it not been for the training given him by his mother.

I speak of Mary Ball Washington, the mother of George Washington, as the first American war mother. My authority for this is the fact that while there were colonial troops in the field before Washington was appointed Commander in Chief, the point is that there was no American Army until George Washington was appointed by Congress to organize it.

Mary Washington lived through those eight years of Revolutionary struggles to witness the final triumph of her son at Yorktown and to meet him again at Fredericksburg on his way from that victorious campaign.

How beautiful and how characteristic was that meeting. George Washington, the hero, the conqueror, the liberator, with his staff of officers stopped at Fredericksburg on their way north from Yorktown especially for the purpose of seeing George Washington's mother. Upon their arrival it was characteristic that Mrs. Washington should have remained at home and sent for George to come and see her. Of that meeting in her modest home we have scant record. But we do know that upon the special request of the foreign officers, among whom were Lafayette, Rochambeau, De Grasse, Von Steuben, and others, Mrs. Washington consented to visit the inn, where she was received by these distinguished foreigners with all the deference due to her noble womanhood. There has come down to us that impressive toast attributed to Lafayette on this occasion, when after meeting Mrs. Washington he declared:

"If such are the matrons of America, well may she boast of illustrious sons."

These foreign officers were anxious to meet the mother of their chief. Their devotion to George Washington naturally created a desire to meet her, who, above all others, had contributed most to his character. We have this description of that meeting:

"They were prepared to expect in the mother that glitter and show which would have been attached to the parents of the great in the countries of the Old World. How they were surprised when, leaning on the arm of her son, she entered the room dressed in the very plain yet becoming garb worn by the Virginia lady of the time. Her address, always dignified and imposing, was courteous, though reserved. She received the complimentary attentions which were paid to her without evincing the slightest elevation, and, at an early hour wishing the company much enjoyment of their pleasures, observed that it was high time for old folks to be in bed and retired, leaning as before on the arm of her son."

Here we have a glimpse through the veil of time into that simple scene which brings us into touch with the first American war mother.

She did not boast of his achievements; she did not speak of his heroic deeds; she did not refer to any great act of his which drew the admiration and devotion of the world to him. To her he was George, the son, and in all the histories of that time we find but one small reference to any compliment she paid him, and that was when she said:

"George was always a good boy and deserves well of his country."

How modest, how retiring, how beautiful is this renunciation, but we may be sure that love and pride and beautiful attachment warmed the heart of this noble woman when, after her immortal contribution to the world, she rested for a time in the glory of life's setting sun and passed on.

To-day we do well to honor war mothers. To-day we bring to them the Nation's thanks and devotion, and it is well that we do so. Every gold star in that glorious constellation of womanhood represents all that could be given—all that could be sacrificed.

But let us not forget those other mothers who have made sacrifices that the world might be made better.

And among those glorious mothers let us exalt that mother who brought into the world the man whose two hundredth birthday anniversary the Nation celebrates in the greatest event of its kind ever held in this or any other country.

The mothers of men are the link between heaven and earth. When we think of our mothers whose noble, unselfish, tireless devotion to us is never dimmed, never destroyed, no matter how far our footsteps wander from the course which they marked out, we are close to the great Creator of us all.

The constancy of mother love is the divine light which shines upon the world. It is the one trustworthy, unfailing guide that leads us all safely home.

The memory of our mothers is a treasure that grows more beautiful with the years. It is the one thing that we can not forget. It is the one thing that we would not forget if we could.

Whatever the buffetings of fate may be, whatever the sorrows and disappointments we encounter in our life struggle, we can always be sure that somewhere there is one who, although she may be sitting in the shadows, yet waits and watches and prays for our return.

Among all true men and women, every day is mother's day. And if we remember her precepts and are guided by her example, the world will be full of beauty and unselfishness.

To all mothers everywhere let us pay that heart tribute which is due them, but which we more especially owe to ourselves, for no thought of motherhood can come to us without lifting us nearer to God.

THE OBSERVANCE OF FLAG DAY, IN CONNECTION WITH GEORGE WASHINGTON BICENTENNIAL CELEBRATION

[Broadcast from the home of Betsy Ross, Philadelphia, June 14, 1931]

To-day I have the rare pleasure of bringing my great radio audience to a house and to a room forever enshrined in the patriotic hearts of the American people.

I am speaking to you from the house of Betsy Ross, on Arch Street in the city of Philadelphia.

In the room where I am standing there was brought into being just 154 years ago the glorious flag of our beloved country.

Here almost at this hour, on June 14, 1777, George Washington, the Commander in Chief of the Continental forces of America, handed to Betsy Ross, the Quaker seamstress, a design for a flag which was to become immortal.

Within these walls was enacted a scene of which little record is left, but that scene will live forever in the spirit of our country.

It was a practical errand which brought General Washington here. He arrived without ceremony, without military display.

Congress had approved the general plan for an American flag. Up to that time our troops had many flags. But our country had none.

The records of Congress disclose no debate upon the question of a flag. We do know, however, the actual wording of the resolution which brought the flag into being.

That resolution stated:

"Resolved, That the flag of the 13 united States be 13 stripes, alternate red and white, that the union be 13 stars, white in a blue field, representing a new constellation."

In these simple words authority was given to General Washington as commander in chief to design the flag, and upon the same day a visit was made to this house and to this very room. There are many conflicting opinions as to the exact date of the event, but I have taken the one that seems backed by the best authority.

When George Washington entered the portals of this modest house, he found Betsy Ross busy at her nedlework, which was her regular occupation. As she worked, she hummed a song softly, so that she could listen for the tiny tinkle of the bell of her shop door in front of this house.

George Washington entered with two companions. One was George Ross, who signed the Declaration of Independence and was an uncle of Betsy's deceased husband. The other was Robert Morris, the great patriot.

As they entered General Washington said:

"Mistress Ross, we have come to-day to ask you to help in making a flag for our country. We do not feel pleased with the grand union flag because of the King's colors in the canton, so we have planned another."

"You can make it, can't you?" asked her husband's uncle.

"To be sure she can," spoke up Robert Morris. "No one could do it any better than she does. Does anyone make finer neckwear?"

"It's different making a flag, but I would like to try. Tell me the idea," said Betsy Ross.

Then George Washington took from his leather pocketbook a small piece of paper on which was a rough drawing of a flag. It had 13 stripes, but a circle of white stars on a blue field took the place of the King's colors.

"What do you think of it?" asked General Washington.

"I think it will be beautiful," exclaimed Betsy Ross. "I shall be honored to make it. But, General, hast thou considered that those 6-pointed stars are not as they are in heraldry? Those are 5-pointed. I will show you."

With one snip of the scissors she cut a paper she had folded and, opening it, showed it to them. It was a star with five perfect points.

For a few minutes they talked over the design of the flag, and when they left Betsy Ross had dropped them another curtsy, and she promised to make them a flag as quickly as she could.

Thus was born that flag which to-day flies above the greatest nation of the earth. That flag means more than an emblem of sovereignty. It means human freedom, equal opportunity, and liberty throughout the world.

To-day we have come to this sacred place. To-day I am speaking within the walls that echoed that brief interview which brought our flag into being.

In the silence of this room come the echoing whispers of a bygone day. Here in these ancient surroundings I send to the Nation that feeling of devotion and of reverence which falls like a garment upon me.

As we look back behind the veil of history, the whole event of which I speak appears in its true American simplicity.

But what dignity, what grandeur, what momentous influences came from that apparently simple incident in this room so many years ago.

As I think of the great expanse of our national domain, as I think of the 123,000,000 of American citizens who are to-day living under the protection of our flag, as I vision in my mind the folds of that beautiful symbol flying from thousands of standards, I feel what little we of to-day can do to honor the memory of George Washington and his compatriots, or to remember with due appreciation the humble part played by that gentle Quaker seamstress, Betsy Ross.

What could be more appropriate upon this great national anniversary than to recall the making of that flag? What could be more appropriate—yes, more truly important—than for a nation to give a thought to-day not only to those who sustained the flag through the blood and tears of a hundred battlefields, but also to Betsy Ross, who represented the loyal womanhood of her day and of all succeeding days in our national history?

As I speak I seem to hear voices calling from the past, voices that tell me strange and wonderful things. These spirit voices can not be truly interpreted to any mortal ears, but I know that from this historic shrine there goes forth a message to Americans everywhere, calling upon them in the name of our beloved America to defend that flag, to honor that flag, and to preserve that flag as long as time shall be.

It is fitting that upon the eve of the great nation-wide celebration of the two hundredth anniversary of the birth of George Washington next year that we should to-day reconsecrate ourselves to our flag and to all it stands for.

It is fitting that there should be a revival in the hearts of all our people of those patriotic impulses that have always, from the very beginning, actuated noble men and women to sacrifice their fortunes and their lives for liberty.

Wherever our flag flies to-day those who gaze upon its protecting folds must realize that in its creation there was brought into being not only a new constellation of States but a new principle of government. It represented a new thought in a world of strife, in a world of oppression, in a world of selfishness—a thought for the betterment of mankind through political freedom.

When that flag was born, there was not a true republic upon the face of the earth. To-day the principles which actuated George Washington and his fellow patriots have extended to the uttermost parts of the world.

Some flags have been flown only for the vanity of kings.

Some flags have been hated by millions of people because of the spirit of conquest and oppression which they represented. Most of the cruelties, the injustices, the prejudices that men have visited upon each other have been wrought under the sanction of a flag.

But your flag and my flag, fellow countrymen, that flag which George Washington gave to us, is the first bright banner of unstained honor to float over a people destined for a vast new freedom.

Upon all the glorious pages of our national history that flag has never been dishonored, nor has it ever been lowered to the enemies of our country.

That flag is a living symbol of the true spirit of America. That flag must stand as long as liberty prevails throughout our land.

This is my interpretation of those whispering voices, to transmit over the silent spaces of the air, in a message to my countrymen.

What was it that first called those early patriots to Washington's side?

What was it that took them from their comfortable homes, from the love of their families, from the security of their occupations to face physical danger and personal ruin?

What was it but some sacred spark of the spirit, something outside themselves, something larger and finer than they, some vision of a better world which only their children might enjoy?

We need to ask ourselves this question and find the answer in our own hearts. We need to kindle in ourselves that same fire of the spirit. We are the children who enjoy what these patriots fought for. The vision which came to them as a far ideal is realized among us who live at this time.

The flag which George Washington designed for us symbolizes the spirit of sacrifice, the courage, and the devotion of those men and women of long ago who gave us the priceless heritage which our country enjoys to-day.

I am convinced in my heart that in the history of our country Almighty God has been at the helm. I feel certain that in the beauty, the dignity, and the significance of our flag as it flies over you and me to-day there is the guiding hand of that protecting Providence which has willed that all should be well with this homeland.

Gone are the patriots of long ago. Gone is Betsy Ross. But what they did and what they left for us will live as long as the hearts of men beat true.

I can not translate the message of those silent voices that come to me in this place, but I can carry to you the thoughts that come to me as I look about me and feel the spirit of that day when George Washington gave to Betsy Ross the design for Old Glory.

INDEPENDENCE DAY OBSERVANCE IN CONNECTION WITH GEORGE WASHINGTON BICENTENNIAL CELEBRATION

[Broadcast from Independence Hall, Philadelphia, July 4, 1931]

I am standing in Independence Hall, Philadelphia, in what is perhaps the most historic room in America. At the table before me was adopted and signed the Declaration of Independence.

The words I speak on this birthday of the Nation come to you from a microphone standing on the very spot where this Nation of ours was born.

Here, on the anniversary of that day, in this hall where so many remarkable events have taken place, I am permitted to look back from this day of peace and security, of enormous social and political progress, and measure the immense consequences that have arisen from that momentous event that occurred in this room a little more than a century and a half ago.

This extraordinary honor has been accorded me as associate director of the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission, created by Congress to organize among the American people the celebration of the two hundredth anniversary of the birth of George Washington, the man who did more than any other to translate the Declaration of Independence into terms of living reality, the man who did more than any other to place the 13 struggling Colonies on a firm foundation and build them into one great Nation of 123,000,000 people.

It is impossible to conceive of a more direct and dramatic linkage between the present and the past—between this Fourth of July of vast fulfillment and that Fourth of July of gigantic political adventure.

As I stand here where this greatest and strongest Nation in the history of the world had its birth and these beginnings, I am swept with reverence and awe.

I am lost in wonder as I think of the imperishable pages of history that were written here, and the mighty forces of progress that were released here by the wise and steadfast men who shaped at this table before me a new charter of human liberties, and brought into being a new era in human affairs that to-day is the hope of humanity throughout the world.

Beneath the flag of our country we Americans must pause and realize in our hearts what that flag stands for. It is the living symbol of the blood and tears of those men and women of a bygone age who went gloriously to their graves that our country might live.

Beneath its sheltering folds the dying eyes of countless heroes grew dim and closed forever, a prayer upon their lips for its preservation.

It is for us to carry forward those sacrifices and those ideals. Who knows but what we say to-day and what we do to-day may not be translated to that far shore where are gathered the heroes of long-gone years? Who knows but that our account is being written as to how well and how worthily we have kept the faith as Americans?

May God help us to act well our part. May God give us some portion of the courage and devotion which created our country, that we may defend its liberties.

In our enjoyment of these liberties let us remember what they cost. The act performed here by these patriots required more than wisdom, great as it was. It called for another quality which they possessed, and which, please Providence, they have handed on. It called for the utmost in moral and physical courage.

In establishing this Nation they had to fling their defiance in the face of a powerful foe. They knew the risk they took, and that risk was real. On the heads of the men who signed the immortal Declaration of Independence, on the heads of every member of their families, the angry Government they defied placed a price.

Benjamin Franklin's jest was far more grim and truthful than humorous when he warned his fellow signers that "We must all hang together, or assuredly we shall all hang separately."

Yet, reckless of what it might cost them, these patriots pledged to the cause all that they had, and all that they were—"their lives, their fortunes, and their sacred honor."

If, in the list of great names they attached to the Declaration of Independence, we miss the greatest of all—the name of George Washington—it is for good and sufficient reason.

While these men wrote at this table George Washington, as Commander in Chief of the Continental Army, was already far away on the field of battle.

Already he was fighting the cause of independence before these others had pondered the terms in which that cause should be proclaimed to the world.

Now, we living Americans are witnesses as to how well those patriots planned. The full and rich life we live to-day attests the greatness of the purpose for which they fought and struggled then.

For the sake of that cause which has made us so great they endured every loss, every danger, and every sacrifice.

And yet, in this vast democracy of Americans to-day, self-ruled as the patriots planned, far richer than they dreamed, and happy and privileged beyond any people that ever lived, I believe the fathers would find their plans justified, their struggles rewarded, their dreams come true.

Here on this table before me were shaped those liberties and privileges which you and I possess to-day as citizens of these United States. As I realize this, never have those rights and privileges seemed to me so sacred, so precious, and so real.

If I can, I want to bring you into this room and give you a sense of the feelings this scene inspires. I want you to see the vision I see, called up in this birthplace of our country, on this, the anniversary of its birth.

I speak to you through a miracle of modern science, an instrument that symbolizes all our marvelous advances since 1776. Yet I speak in profound humility.

These very advances we have achieved make it all the more needful that we ask ourselves, on this July 4, how well we have kept the moral courage of that 4th of July of 1776—how far are we ready to pledge to our country to-day "our lives, our fortunes, and our sacred honor?"

I am one who believes we can answer that question with pride and respect of self.

I believe we can listen to the whispering voices that echo from these ancient walls without self-reproach. I can but dimly repeople this historic room. Yet my heart beats with new devotion, new love for my country and my fellow Americans, as there passes before my inner vision that procession of patriots.

Here, in this very chair, sat John Hancock, President of the Congress. There, in rows, many others upon that everlasting roll of honor. Fifty-six in all! Immortals! Americans!

Before them I bow in humble respect because of the sacrifice they made. But, my fellow Americans, I am one who believes we have guarded well the great trust they placed in our hands. I believe we have fought the good fight; I believe we have kept the faith.

We live in a day when it is common to hear that our country has lapsed in patriotism. It is said by many to have fallen from the lofty ideals of the founders. It is thought that because we have grown rich we must have grown corrupt.

It is said of us that we are lost in material gain; that we are dead to the spirit that first breathed life into the Nation and is vital to its very existence.

I am not one who believes all patriotism perished here in this sacred hall where it was born. I am not one who believes that all self-sacrifice and devotion to country disappeared with the men who here first practiced those virtues 155 years ago.

I believe these United States of America have grown to be the great Nation they are because we have had throughout the years of our history unfailing generations of patriots. I believe these succeeding generations have always defended American rights and liberties in a way that would earn them the blessings of the patriots of 1776.

We complain that disaffection is abroad in our land. There are those who carp at this Government, which has achieved so much. They would rip it to pieces and set up another. It is taken as one more sign that we have slipped from the standards of our fathers.

If we have indifference toward the public interest to-day, let us remember that in the days of its infancy the cause of liberty had its way to make against a sea of the same troubles.

Valley Forge is the epic story of men who endured every visible hardship for the sake of an invisible cause. Yet now we know that the worst of Valley Forge might have been prevented by men who should have been true to their duties and instead were not.

Even in those heroic days of the Declaration of Independence, when men of lofty character were winning liberties for future generations at every cost to themselves, there were men who were willing to profit by the sacrifices of these others.

In the dark days of that winter of 1777, John Adams, whose name stands high on the list of Signers of the Declaration of Independence, wrote home from Philadelphia to his devoted wife the bitter and despairing words, "I am ashamed of the times in which I live."

Would John Adams be more ashamed of the Americans of 1812, the Americans of 1861, of 1898, of the Americans who lie in the fields and the forests of France to-day?

I can not believe it. The truth of it is that here in this room where I stand the founding of our country was not finished but only begun. Ever since that immortal day we have been busy in founding our Nation. We are still founding our Nation. The great men who shaped the immortal document that once lay on this table before me were not the only ones who have signed it.

The Declaration of Independence is being signed at this very moment by millions of Americans. It is being signed in spirit by every American with a spark of love for his native land. It is being signed in spirit by every American who labors and plans for the larger good of the country. It is being signed in spirit by any American who contributes any humble thing, be it only the digging of a ditch, to the good and comfort of his fellows.

Wherever a devoted American mother toils and denies herself for the preservation and progress of her family she defies an invisible oppressor and writes her own charter of freedom.

I can not believe that the patriots of old would belittle the moral height of that mother and the thousands of Americans she represents. I can not believe we have lapsed so far.

I will not believe that the men who sat here on July 4, 1776, would be deeply ashamed of the record we bring back to them here on July 4 of this year.

These are some of the feelings inspired by the great memories that will lurk in this chamber forever.

If we have done thus well with the Nation that the fathers placed in our hands, it is only because we have gone back, faithfully and often, and refreshed ourselves at the fountains of inspiration they left us in their deeds and their character.

If this Nation is to go on to a future without an end, it will be only as we and our children come back, again and again, to these memories of the fathers, to their teachings, and to their examples.

It should be our only purpose in celebrating the Fourth of July and the signing of the Declaration of Independence. This year, next year, and forever it should be the day when we check our course and set our national compass by that glorious star of patriotic purpose which they set in the eternal heaven of human affairs.

As I speak these words our people are in the midst of material difficulties. We are plagued with personal worries. We are afflicted with discontent and threatened suffering. Because of these discomforts we have turned upon each other in bitter recrimination. It is a time that gives rise to violent differences in politics, in business. Our entire system of life is under fire of criticism.

But even in this we only repeat the experiences of the fathers. They also knew what it was to be vexed with divided counsels and violent clashes of interest.

But in the midst of their perplexities they knew what it was to turn to the calm, serene, steadfast courage and judgment of George Washington. And in 1932, I believe, we are going to turn again and rally about him.

I believe that in 1932 the spirit of George Washington will rise from his tomb in Mount Vernon and bring us together again as the living Washington stilled the storms that swept over the days when he lived in the flesh.

I believe this celebration of the two hundredth anniversary of the birth of George Washington is going to afford the American people the greatest national rallying point they ever have had.

I can see this coming. For more than a year the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission has been guiding and gathering up the Nation's slumbering interest in its greatest man. I have watched that interest come to life and breathe the fire of enthusiastic vitality.

I see in this a Nation swept with a single emotion. It is an impulse on the part of 123,000,000 Americans to forget their differences and rally as one about the rock of this great American's character.

I predict George Washington will repeat in spirit the great work that a century and a half ago he performed in fact. He will summon all Americans away from their bickerings and their discontents. He will bid them forget themselves and remember their country. He will bid them rededicate themselves to the giving of self for the good of all.

Out of our deathless love for him he will ask us to reconsecrate ourselves to the great and simple principles upon which he and the framers of the Declaration of Independence built this Nation, to last as long as we keep burning the sacred fires of their example and their leadership.

Out from the moving shadows of this impressive room there comes the spirit of courage and peace. That divine influence which guided the heroes of the past still lives, still exerts its potent guardianship.

The God, our Father, who placed his benediction upon the founders, will not neglect those of succeeding generations if they remain true to American ideals. The shadows whisper this message; this ancient room bears witness to its truth.

To you, my fellow Americans, I appeal over the distances of space to carry this message as I hear it in the mysterious murmurings of this place. Let us live true, let us guard the heritage these signers of the declaration have left to us.

Let us honor and preserve all that they stand for, their memories ever strong in our minds, their spirit ever active in our hearts. Thus, in confidence may we look forward to a united America, strong and enduring among the nations of the earth.

FORT NECESSITY GROUND-BREAKING CEREMONY, COMMEMORATING GEORGE WASHINGTON'S FIRST EXPERIENCE IN BATTLE

[Broadcast from Fort Necessity, Pa., September 29, 1931]

We are here to break ground for a national monument long neglected, to perform a duty long overdue.

It pleases me to think that the motive leading us now to the building of this monument comes from the approaching world-wide celebration of the two hundredth anniversary of the birth of George Washington, an enterprise which I have had the honor to advance as associate director of the United States commission created by Congress for that purpose.

The entire Nation is aroused to a feeling that the coming anniversary will serve not only as a measure of George Washington's greatness but as a measure of our progress as his countrymen. In that feeling we are turning to Washington with a new and burning interest in everything he did, and with a new sense of the great debt we owe him.

So I can say with excellent reason that amid all we do in George Washington's honor the dedication of this monument at Fort Necessity will be one of the most appropriate and outstanding tributes we can pay him.

For here on this sacred soil, once reddened with patriot blood, George Washington began his labors in our behalf. We of the United States to-day who stand here represent the results of what he here began.

In this place George Washington opened the eyes of the world to North America and stirred two great nations to possess it.

Here he first inspired the colonies to possess it for themselves.

Where we now stand a boy of 22 changed the map of the world and altered the course of history.

All our own struggles for freedom for the right to go our own way came 20 years later. But to this point we may trace all those threads of influence that culminated in the War of the Revolution.

Here, in reality, began the United States of America. And here, in a forge of fire, was welded the courage and the character of the man who chiefly made us what we are.

If ever a few acres of American soil deserves to be marked out forever, it is this site of young George Washington's "Fort Necessity."

With all my heart I congratulate the people of this community, of this State, and of the Nation, in liberally contributing to this splendid enterprise. You have allowed no discouragement to stand in your way. Next year we shall dedicate the fruits of your patriotic self-sacrifice in your gift of this monument to the Nation.

But we are here for a purpose beyond ourselves. It is our privilege on this occasion to rewrite American history, as George Washington himself wrote it here in deeds of blazing valor.

For years historians have regarded Washington's fight at Fort Necessity as a defeat. Washington himself was unaware at the time of the real significance of what he had done and wrote to his brother that he was "soundly beaten."

Now the events that then confused him have cleared. Not only that—we have found long-buried contemporary records which I am here giving to the country for perhaps the first time.

I am straining no terms of language, I am twisting no facts of history in pronouncing this fight at Fort Necessity not only a great moral victory for George Washington but an actual military success.

To understand what he did let us take ourselves back 177 years. Let us stand here at George Washington's side, facing the tremendous odds that we now know he defied.

It is 1754. Pioneering American settlers have penetrated this region, and so have wakened England and France to what this great wilderness is worth. Now both these nations are reaching for the prize. The French are driving our settlers out and fencing the region off with a line of forts from Quebec to New Orleans.

Virginia's governor intends to stop this, and the year before has sent George Washington, a youth of 21, and almost alone, to warn the French out of this, our territory. It is a miracle for him to come out of the wilderness alive, but he brings back word that the French are determined to stick.

It alarms the Colonies. Some of them act at once. Virginia sends Captain Trent to build a fort of her own at the forks of the Ohio. Ample forces are to back him up.

George Washington, now a lieutenant colonel and second in command, heads the vanguard of a few hundred men. He is ordered to stick to defense, but fight if he must. Soon his superior officer dies of an accident, and Washington is in sole command of the expedition at 22, the age of a West Point cadet.

Early in April he strikes across the Maryland line and over the mountains, cutting his road as he goes for the supporting artillery that never arrives. Reenforcements of more than 1,000 men are promised him and only a handful ever reach him.

It takes him two months to get a little beyond this place. His food runs short. The only plentiful thing is alarming news.

He learns that the little Virginia fort at the forks of the Ohio has been taken by the French. The meaning of that is war—with George Washington a boy never before in battle, 60 miles from his base of supplies, in a wilderness crowded with enemies, while his provisions vanish, his men tire, and no adequate reinforcements appear. Only the French receive substantial reinforcements.

A hundred of his men are sick. The woods are full of spies who tell the French of his weakness. And he learns that the French are now 900 strong, with 700 Indians and cannon.

Against such odds retreat would not have been a disgrace. Washington chose to fight it out.

It may be that the amazing sense of clear judgment he possessed compelled him to stand. Retreat would have meant the loss of his Indian allies and perhaps the desertion of his men. But I think that what settled the matter was the Washington spirit. Again he was there on a definite errand, and it was the Washington habit to do what he set out to do.

He wrote to his governor, "I doubt not if you hear I am beaten, but you will at the same time hear that we have done our duty in fighting as long as there was a possibility of hope."

Those words alone justify this monument here.

On a previous alarm he had taken the precaution to throw up intrenchments here where we stand in Great Meadows. A little beyond this place he encounters a scouting party of French and wins the skirmish. A lone survivor of the enemy escapes to tell the tale. Soon Washington hears that the entire French force is on the move against him, 900 strong, with 700 Indian allies and cannon—five times Washington's little band of 300 men.

By June 1 he had his fort palisaded. He had a month to await the attack, while his supplies ran low. No wonder he called this "Fort Necessity." Even his Indian allies deserted, seeing how weak he was against such numbers.

Military engineers of to-day have criticized Washington for planting his fort here in the open, surrounded by woods on higher ground.

He knew his business. He knew the French and Indians fought from behind trees. He knew the range of their muskets. He planted himself where his enemies, in order to hit him, must leave their shelter and be hit themselves.

Precisely this happened. But only now do we learn the full facts from accounts at the time, some of them supplied by Washington himself, as published in a remote colonial newspaper and buried from sight until now.

On July 3 at 11 o'clock in the morning one of Washington's sentinels opened fire. It is reported that he killed three Frenchmen before hurrying to the fort. The action was on.

Washington drew up his forces before the trenches, ready to die to the last man, but alert not to be fooled.

At first the enemy kept at long range, hoping to draw Washington's fire. It must have amazed the young colonel not to be charged by an enemy of such strength. Finally he ordered his men behind the trenches to shoot it out, wherever an enemy left his shelter.

For nine hours of a rainy day, until 8 o'clock at night, his men did shoot, and only now do we know that every man in his command accounted for one of the foe. This old newspaper tells us that 300 French and Indians were killed and large numbers were wounded.

That is why Washington was further amazed when the French twice called him to parley. Twice he declined, suspecting a trick. Twice he declined the terms presented him and compelled a change. Finally, at midnight, in a driving rain, he did agree to terms that he largely shaped himself.

Washington lost some 30 men killed and 70 wounded, but, again the old newspaper tells us, all that night and part of the next day his enemies were secretly burying their dead and removing their wounded.

In the morning they marched away to the north with all their remaining numbers, while George Washington and his little band trooped south, their drums beating, their flags flying. He had stood off five times his number and sent them away, glad to be gone.

Can that be called a defeat?

The immediate consequence of the fight that happened where we stand was to make young Colonel Washington a man discussed all over Europe. The ultimate consequences of what he did here were the retirement of the French, our war for independence, and the creation of the United States.

Can that be called a defeat?

Do we not rather see the hand of destiny asserting itself even thus early in the life of the Nation, in the fact that George Washington marched his men proudly away from this fort on the date later to become more memorable still—the Fourth of July?

Did I say the hand of destiny? It was the hand of Almighty God. For never in my heart have I been more convinced of an intervening Providence in the affairs of men than in the conviction which has come to me through a study of the life of George Washington.

From boyhood until he passed beyond this life George Washington was an instrument chosen by the Ruler of us all for a career which shaped the history of the world.

Through all his trials, perils, sufferings, and sacrifices he was upheld by that strong consecration to duty which comes only to those chosen of God. In my heart of hearts I know that the unseen hand of divine Providence guided the career of this most useful of mortals, and in paying tribute to the life and character of George Washington we acknowledge the source of his greatness and of his power.

George Washington never met defeat. His was a triumphant and successful career always. What we may term defeats were mere incidents in a chain of sublime achievements.

It is high time we took this Battle of Great Meadows out of the shadows of defeat and placed it in the glorious light of triumph and military success.

In raising this monument we are commemorating more than the glory of arms. We are for the first time truly interpreting the genius of a man and the genius of a people.

It is twice hallowed soil where we stand. George Washington thought so much of these consecrated acres that 15 years after the battle he bought Great Meadows and kept it until his death.

Next year on this historic ground we shall dedicate a monument of stone. Around it, throughout the land and throughout the year, we shall raise a still greater monument—the monument of a nation's gratitude felt in a nation's heart.

Yet even this is not all we shall have built in George Washington's memory. The greatest of all memorials to George Washington is spoken of by a forgotten biographer in words that I wish to repeat:

"There is a greater Washington monument, still unfinished but appropriate and significant in all its parts. It covers an area bounded by the Lakes and the Gulf, the Atlantic and the Pacific. Its final completion may be delayed for centuries, but the quantity of treasure lavished upon it and the number of workmen employed increases from year to year; for expense is no object while the country is persuaded that it is perfecting a monument to Washington after Washington's own plans—the United States of America."

So we the people are the real memorial to George Washington. Let us see, next year and forever, that we worthily wear his name engraved upon our hearts. Let us truly live according to his precept and example, that the glory of our country may never be dimmed, that our flag may never be dishonored, and that a free, enlightened, and happy people may rightfully claim kinship with the immortal George Washington.

FROM THE HOME OF MARY BALL WASHINGTON, THE MOTHER OF GEORGE WASHINGTON

[Broadcast from the home of George Washington's Mother, Fredericksburg, Va., January 1, 1932]

I am speaking to the people of the United States from a shrine made sacred by its immortal memories.

I am in the home of Mary Ball Washington, mother of George Washington, in historic Fredericksburg, Va. Beside me is an object of special reverence. It is the most precious timepiece in all America. This beautiful grandfather's clock belonged to Mary Washington and solemnly tolled the passing hours when George Washington and his mother met here in that exalted communion of mother and son.

In a few minutes this clock of artistic design and fully 8 feet tall will strike for the mothers and sons of our country the 12 strokes that will mark the first high noon of 1932, the two hundredth anniversary year of George Washington's birth.

You will hear over the infinite spaces of the air the resonant tones of the very clock that voiced the hour when our greatest American opened his eyes to a waiting world. Those first sweet notes of an historic hour will reecho through the universe. They will never die away, but will continue on and on until the end of recorded time. The impulses of those vibrations surround us to-day, after 200 years, and will exert their invisible influences upon us as long as America lives.

When this clock strikes again, it will be the voice of history and destiny itself, calling us back to our own.

I know of no more significant expression of this solemn hour. And surely there could be no more appropriate setting where this reverential act could be staged, than in this bedroom, with the hush of the years upon it, yet vibrant with the echoes of the past.

They crowd upon me—those sweet voices of the dead. I am oppressed and confused by the voices so long silent, that strive to speak again. For every article in this low-ceilinged room bears witness to those touching and dramatic scenes that were enacted here.

I face the colonial fireplace where comfort glowed and which symbolizes the beautiful provision the dutiful George Washington made for his aged and ailing mother. By its side is the low chair where she sat those many, and ofttimes lonely hours, thinking of her boy, leading his tattered troops in war. Can we not read in these contemplations the anxiety, the fears, the love, and the prayers of that mother who gave to humanity so great a son and who sent him forth with noble self-sacrifice to serve his fellow men.

Here by this window I look out upon scenes perhaps little changed from that day when Mary waited for her son's return.

Out through the garden door I see the colonial kitchen with its utensils for domestic concerns much as they were when Mary, with her own hands, prepared her boy's favorite cakes. Beyond, through the serene beds of old Virginia flowers, I see the box-bordered walks that led to beautiful Kenmore, the mansion home of George's sister, Betty, who kept careful watch upon her mother's comfort when he was far away.

And as soon as he was able, he bought for his mother this modest house, among her friends in Fredericksburg, amid the scenes and the people she loved. Here, in this quaint old house in which I speak, he placed her to live out her days in peace.

So our return to this house is sanctified by some of the most beautiful memories of American history. The walls of this house are witness to the most sacred hours in George Washington's life, the hours when he was at his greatest and best—the hours when he came back from war and chambers of state, from stress and turmoil of public life to seek counsel at the knees of his adored mother. This same clock, which you will hear, measured those precious hours.

When the notes come to you, the memory of these scenes in George Washington's life can not fail to inspire in each heart an exalted feeling of gratitude and love for the mother and the son.

Hardly had George Washington grown to manhood before his countrymen realized his qualities of leadership and gave him important duties and responsibilities, greater perhaps than were ever placed upon the shoulders of mortal man.

I know that the women of America, in whose breats beats the universal heart of motherhood, can realize how Mary Washington longed for her boy. Mothers of America who have lost sons in battle know with what trembling, with what prayerful anxiety, Mary Washington sat here waiting for his home-coming. I know that the mothers of Americans everywhere join with me in the conviction that those prayers which were uttered here in this room to the God of infinite mercy had their answers then as they have now.

Those prayers gave George Washington to the world. They saved him in time of peril and they have preserved his spirit which surrounds us all at this moment. Here in this house where he placed her to live in comfort, he always returned as often as he could.

He came to see her in sickness and in health. He came to ask as to her comfort. Even when mountainous cares of state came to burden George Washington's mind, and crowded his life with labor, he always found time for a visit to his mother. May we not think with truth that this great man returned here for that spiritual guidance that so influenced his eventful career. May we not feel that he came here because at his mother's knee he felt closer to God.

George Washington resembled his mother in many ways. Mary Washington gave more than a great son to the world—she gave herself.

Something of George Washington, the boy, lived on in George Washington, the man. He never went away on an errand of great importance without first visiting his mother to receive her blessing.

And for the unselfish sacrifice of Mary Washington God rewarded her as no other American mother has ever been rewarded. She saw that son grow tall and strong and she saw him raised to greatness that no other man of our country has ever surpassed. She saw him acclaimed by all the world, adored by his fellow men. And yet to her he was always the son, the boy—her George.

At last it was permitted Mary Washington to greet her son at the end of his physical danger. For here he came after Yorktown. He had won the War of the Revolution. He had made America independent. He had made these United States of ours forever free. He stood at the pinnacle of his greatness—a colossal figure in the world.

Many a victorious warrior has tasted the fruits of popular acclaim and has done so as a natural thing. George Washington put all that behind him. His first thought was of his mother, and the final victory of the Revolution had hardly been won when he came to Fredericksburg to see her.

He rode into the city at the head of the staff of the victorious army. He came with a score of generals, most of them distinguished foreigners who had shared with him the dangers of battle.

Yet when he came to Fredericksburg, crowned with the laurels of success, his mind went back to the days when he was a little boy and he and his mother were impoverished and obscure. He came here to this house—not with the pomp and glory of the mighty warrior, not as a hero of a grateful people, but as the son. He came alone on foot.

He had discarded the trappings of command. He was the son. Here at this window through which I am now looking sat the mother, waiting, as she had done so many times before, for those familiar footsteps.

Here in this room where I am now standing, with this clock ticking away their all too brief time together, they met again. Upon that meeting the veil of time has closed as too sacred a thing for other eyes to witness. But we know that upon her son's urgent invitation Mary Washington set forth from this house on her last public appearance, when she consented to appear for a brief time at the historic reception here in Fredericksburg to celebrate the great victory at Yorktown.

We are told of her quiet and modest dignity there. We are told how eager the foreign officers who aided Washington were to meet the mother of their leader. And with the same dignity she retired from the brilliant scene upon the arm of her son with the simple words that it was time for one so old as herself to be in bed.

When George Washington saw his mother for the last time, it was in this room and he was still a greater man, for the people of the United States had demanded with one voice that he be their first President.

Yet he could not assume this office given him with such overwhelming public trust without first coming here to Fredericksburg to this little house to receive the blessing of his now fast-failing mother. It was probably the sweetest reunion of their lives, and it was God's will that this meeting should be their last.

Mary Washington knew it. Bravely she sought to conceal it. A wasting disease was eating her life away. In vain her great son tried to put away her fears, and looked forward to seeing her again and again. Mary Washington stilled him with this immortal blessing: "You will see me no more; my great age and disease warn me that I shall not be long for this world. I trust in God that I may be somewhat prepared for a better. But go, George, fulfill the high destinies which Heaven appears to have intended for you; go my son, and may Heaven's and a mother's blessing be with you always."

The words were only too true. It was not long after this scene that Mary Washington died to the ticking of this old clock.

The whispering voices still crowd upon me. The solemnity of this scene chockes my voice. I can only bow my head in reverence and ask my countrymen everywhere to join in tribute to the memory of the great mother and the immortal son.

SUNDAY REFLECTIONS AT OLD POHICK CHURCH, WHERE GEORGE WASHINGTON AND FAMILY WORSHIPED

[Broadcast from Pohick Church, Virginia, February 21, 1932]

On a lovely, rolling hill characteristic of northern Virginia is one of the most beautiful and historic shrines associated with the life of George Washington. I am privileged to-day to stand within the ancient walls of Pohick Church, which is as intimately connected with the life of George Washington as Mount Vernon itself.

Here in the reverential stillness of this sacred place I come as a humble pilgrim, and from this place I have been permitted to broadcast to the Nation the thoughts and impressions that come to me.

Virginia is unusually rich in its religious history. Dotted over its area are scores of historic churches dating back from the earliest colonial days. Of all of these fine mementos of the time of the established church in the Old Dominion, this building is notable, and one of the outstanding landmarks which the hundreds of thousands of tourists who visit this country during the period of the celebration of the two hundredth anniversary of the birth of George Washington should visit. The celebration begins to-morrow and extends until Thanksgiving Day this year.

We are told that the present Pohick Church is located on land selected and purchased by George Washington in 1767, and is successor to the old Pohick Church, a frame building which stood on King's Highway, leading to Occoquan Ferry, a few miles south, which was built about 1690. It is not only a finely preserved type of colonial brick edifice, but it has a history romatic and fascinating. Truro Parish was established in 1732, the year of George Washington's birth, and continued to use the old church until about 1767, when it was decided to build a new one some distance from the old.

The new Pohick Church was ready for occupancy by the congregation in 1772. George Washington drew the plans for this church, and as in other similar plans, he went into great detail, not only designating the proportions, the character, and the material, but also the decorations and church furniture. We may be sure that he exercised a potent influence in these matters, since he had himself purchased the land upon which Pohick Church is located.

When it was proposed to erect this so-called new church the argument over its location waxed strong, but Washington ended it by making a survey so complete that it indicated the exact distance which each of the parishioners had to travel as between the new and the old sites. In Washington's surveys this location was shown to be nearer and most convenient for the larger number of the church members.

It must be recalled that George Washington was vestryman of this parish at this time. As in all things with which he was concerned, George Washington took a deep and active interest in the building and the conduct of this church from the time it was planned until his death.

It must be recalled also that the position of vestryman of a parish in Virginia during the time of the established church was a position of considerable civic as well as religious importance.

However, it is not with this side of the church history that we are concerned to-day. Our whole attention is centered upon the church itself and the intimate relation which it bore to George Washington, his friends, and neighbors.

Pohick Church occupies a site directly upon the highway between Washington and Richmond. It is located about three miles beyond the point where the old road branches off from the highway to Mount Vernon. Within the churchyard surrounded by a brick wall there is about an acre and a half of ground in which are the tombs of the parishioners of long ago.

There is an atmosphere of serene tranquillity about this edifice which impresses us like a benediction, and the gentle breezes move through the old oak trees and whisper of the mystery of time. What a colorful, what a romantic, what beautiful setting for the quiet and dignified events that took place here during the youth of our country.

One can not come to this placid old house of God without drawing aside in his imagination the curtains of time to look backward to the days when George Washington, his dear family, his friends, and neighbors gathered here to worship.

As I look out through the open doorway to the burying ground that holds the ashes of some of the noblest personages of Virginia's great history, to my mind comes back again that pageant of beauty, of citizenship, and of neighborly kindness which was witnessed here on those Sunday mornings long ago.

Let us within the limitations of our fancy place ourselves as members of the Mount Vernon family preparing to come to this meeting place nearly 175 years ago.

It was customary for the family at Mount Vernon to attend church regularly, and for the usual guests, of whom there were always from two or three to a dozen, to attend with the family, although none was urged to go. Carriages were, of course, provided, and an early breakfast was the rule, because it consumed practically a day to attend church and return.

Pohick Church is about 6 miles from Mount Vernon over the old road, but this 6 miles, which now can be traversed upon a beautiful roadway in a few minutes by automobile, was a formidable journey 175 years ago.

Only those who are familiar with the primitive Virginia roads can realize what traveling meant in those days. The road led through the wood and partly swamp ground. In winter it was usually deep in clay, rutted, and difficult of passage except by carriages drawn by from four to six horses. In summer it was dusty and rough, as little care was given to roadways in those days, for water transportation among the plantations along the Potomac was in common usage for transporting goods and produce.

So that the coaches going from Mount Vernon to Pohick Church were sturdily built. Sometimes there were three or four coach loads of family and friends. Men, women, and children of the household and guests, in what we would consider somewhat gay attire for such an occasion, went by coach. The servants and retainers of the estate usually traveled horseback following the coaches, ready to lend assistance in case of need.

The great Washington himself with his beloved Martha and the adopted children of Mrs. Washington usually occupied a carriage by themselves. We the house guests, intermingle among the other guests in the two or three carriages of this pilgrimage, and we alight with relief at the gate of this ancient church yard.

Here, as General Washington and his party arrive, are gathered many men, women, and children who are upon terms of familiar intimacy with the Mount Vernon family. Walking around to the sourthern entrance, which is in reality the original front, we mark the lovely pedimented portals in gray sandstone.

As we pass through the lovely portal of the church we observe the box-pew arrangement drawn by Washington, and note the great pulpit standing at the head of the cross aisle in the middle of the north wall of the church. Proceeding to this point of advantage we inspect the more striking details of the church, and we turn to the altarpiece.

We are told that if we could see this in its original condition—for the interior of the church has suffered from the ravages and devastations of war—we would mark the gold-lettered creed, Lord's Prayer and the Ten Commandments in gold leaf, and the ornaments in the tabernacle and the capitols of the pilasters also covered with gold leaf. The palm leaves and festoon design on the pulpit are also covered with gold leaf furnished by George Washington and his dear friend, George William Fairfax.

Immediately in the center of the cross aisle stands the original font, made by William Copein. This was taken out of the church during the Civil War and was secreted upon a near-by farm. If we follow the Washington family along the west aisle toward the altarpiece, we pause at pews 28 and 29 and know that these pews were owned and occupied by Washington and his family on all occasions of public worship.

The form of that worship then resembled closely the form of worship still familiar to the people of this congregation. The Washington family go sedately to the ancient box pew in which we take our seats. This pew and all others of the church has comfortable cushioned benches partitioned off in rectangular form, so that there were seats on three sides and a small gate leading into the aisle. Upon that gate is still a silver plate bearing the name of George Washington.

We now assume that the beautiful service has closed. The congregation has filed sedately into the outer yard, where for an hour or so there will be pleasant neighborhood gossip and much comment upon the affairs of the vicinity. Soon all are gone and we stand alone in the hush of this sacred place, and the shadows come creeping into the corners and back into the gallery which was reserved for humble worshippers.

I wish it were in my power to convey through the miracle of radio the impression of beauty, of stillness, of solemnity, that enfolds me. Again do I people this beautiful room with the images of those long gone. Again do I hear in imagination the whisperings of those who gathered here to worship an everlasting God, who knows not neither time nor place. Again do I see those kneeling figures and heads bowed in prayer that echoes back through the years as though t'were yesterday.

Again do I see the mighty form of General Washington, the Father of his Country, kneeling in humble supplication to his Father on high. In simplicity, in childlike faith, the great man bows in prayer. The soft music of forgotten hymns seems to come to me as the echo of an angel's song, and I feel that my humble presence here is as it were a ghost that intrudes upon another era, another state of social order, another age when our history as a Nation was beginning.

Gone are those mighty souls who left their indelible impress upon our history and our culture. Gone is the romance, the color, the drama of their sumptuous lives. Gone is the rich bounty of old Virginia, although the inheritance of its hospitality will never fade.

Here I feel that exaltation and an emotion that I can not express in words. Here lingers within walls hallowed by memory the very scent of the old-fashioned flowers.

To Americans everywhere I would that I had the power of bringing you in spirit to my side. To Americans everywhere I would that they could feel this sacred presence as I feel it now. To the hearts of all humanity I would convey the meaning of this place and this moment, that we could all unite in a common impulse of devotion to our God; to a sense of that ancient neighborly friendliness which was actually part of the old-time religion.

I would that we could join together in the simple hymns they sang; be impressed by the devotions of their day and dedicate ourselves to the sincerity, the simplicity, and the beauty of their lives. They are not far away. They seem to be here at my side, and the rhapsody of memory exalts my soul to their worship and to mine, in humility in the presence of our common Creator.

We need it, fellow Americans. We need a return, not only to the wisdom, the courage, and the character of George Washington, but we need a return to his calm faith in the God of human destiny. We need a new consecration to that morality which guides and stimulates the acts of our daily lives. We need a devotion that surmounts difficulties, that overcomes opposition, that triumphs in the relationship of men with men.

These devoted people who builded this church, who worshiped here in these inspirational surroundings, who set us an example of good living, fine companionship, and steadfast honor, would bring us back again into the stream of life as they knew it.

We need the calm, sobering influence of practical religion by which we may set our course, and we need to reexamine these landmarks of public and private decency which point out the undeviating course of justice and kindness and love.

The lessons of this hour are the lessons of simplicity, the lessons of childlike faith, the lessons of the immortality of the soul. Mark it well, "Lest we forget, lest we forget."

I seem to feel, as George Washington felt, the influence of all these great sermons that were preached here by men of God. I seem to feel that from every word they spoke there continues an echo that swells into a glorious chorus of divine praise.

Here the greatest American found companionship with God. Here he received those sacraments that strengthened his character, steadied his purpose, and fitted him for the momentous part he played in the epic drama of his time. And there at beautiful Mt. Vernon, a few miles away, he sleeps, beside his beloved Martha, to the requiem of immortal adulation of all mankind.

This is God's house, and here we know we are close to our Creator, and as we go hence a glorious recessional of the ancient faith must ring always in our hearts.

Reluctantly I turn to go. The spell is still upon me. In this midwinter afternoon the shadows gather early, and, as I slowly walk toward the world and its concerns, the words of that sweet poem come back to me with a new revelation of truth: "Standeth God within the shadows keeping watch above his own."

WHEN THE GEORGE WASHINGTON BICENTENNIAL CELEBRATION BEGAN

]Broadcast from Washington, February 23, 1932[

The great celebration of the bicentennial of the birth of George Washington has been formally opened, and from now on interest in the observance of this historic event will gather momentum until its climax and the end of the celebration on Thanksgiving Day of this year.

Yesterday witnessed the opening of these nation-wide, I should say world-wide, plans which have been maturing for the past two years. We of the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission, of which I have the honor to be associate director, are proud of the overwhelming response of the people of the United States to the work which we have been doing. We are gratified beyond all measure of expression at the cooperation, the sympathetic helpfulness, and the deep patriotic feeling that have been exemplified in every part of our beloved land.

I speak from the heart when I say that all of us who have been concerned in this momentous work are deeply touched at the appreciation which has been given to our humble efforts, and we are inspired by the obvious fact that the people of the United States everywhere have rallied to the spirit and purpose of this occasion beyond anything that could have been anticipated.

The events of the past two years have occupied our minds, our hearts, and our hands beyond any similar work that was ever undertaken. The beginning of this celebration yesterday was marked by observance in thousands of towns and cities throughout the Nation and in millions of homes and schools and churches. From one end of the country to the other, in our insular possessions, in foreign lands, wherever Americans reside, there has been exhibited an interest and a whole-hearted sentiment of the true American spirit which should hearten every real American living under the protection of our flag.

The nations of the world joined with us yesterday in paying homage to our great Washington. In practically all foreign countries radio broadcasts were made by heads of government, statesmen, and patriots, so that the name of Washington resounded throughout the earth.

The celebration in the National Capital naturally was the center of immediate interest, because here the Government itself, in the most formal, dignified, and magnificent way, paid its tribute to Washington with solemn and beautiful ceremony.

The address of the President of the United States and the singing of America by a grand chorus of the entire Nation was carried by the miracle of radio to every part of the world. Yesterday the man who still is and ever will be to us the Father of our Country reached the hearts of his people as never before. To-day the press of the world tells us how the hearts of humanity responded.

To-day it is my proud privilege, through the courtesy of this great broadcasting system, to thank the 120,000,000 of Americans who responded so magnificently to this call of a great man to a great occasion.

On behalf of the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission I tender the thanks of this Government to our people everywhere and to those across the seas for their interest and their help in this fitting testimonial to the memory of our greatest American.

I can hardly realize what has come to pass. The celebration has begun in a manner that overwhelms me. It is not only the greatest event of its kind ever held in the history of the world but it is impossible now to conceive how anything could have been added to this mighty tribute of the peoples of all countries. The words I speak are hopelessly inadequate to express what I, an American citizen and lover of George Washington, would like to convey to my fellow Americans.

No precedent guided us, for no such celebration was ever attempted by any nation at any time. We set to work with energy and enthusiasm, which have not abated during all these months and years of effort.

We were sustained by an unfaltering confidence that Americans were eager to participate in this form of tribute. That confidence grew with the passing of time and with the thousands upon thousands of letters that came to the commission from all over the world, and especially all over our own country. We were inspired with new confidence, new faith, and new energy. I may say truthfully that I do not believe any organization of the Government, in time of war or peace, has ever given such unstinted service, loyalty, and talent as have those who have aided me in the conduct of this mighty enterprise. On behalf of Americans everywhere I want to express my appreciation of this service, which is as truly a tribute to Washington as any ceremony or any material monument.

What we witnessed here in the National Capital yesterday was an awakening that gives encouragement to all of patriotic heart and mind.

When the President of the United States stood in the National Capitol and delivered his wonderful tribute to the memory of George Washington, I felt a thrill I can not describe. It was what we had worked for, planned for, hoped for all these years. It was the greatest historical celebration in the life of our country and not at least for another hundred years will there be anything like it. Our dream was realized, our hopes fulfilled, and I know that George Washington received the tribute that he would have liked to receive, because it was not in the form of a new monument or material evidence of our growth but was an expression from the hearts and minds of his people—the people of the United States.

I say this with the pride of an American. I say it with a heart full of gratitude to those who have joined with us in the planning of this great celebration. We Americans have always loved George Washington, but to-day we love him with a new revelation of understanding. We love him because we know more about him, and knowing more about him we realize the mighty stature of the man.

What the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission needed to do was to awaken the love of our people to this new understanding of Washington. It was a mighty task, and we are proud to feel that with the support of the people themselves the task has been well done.

Eight years ago far-sighted men in Congress had a vision of just what we witnessed yesterday and took steps to prepare for it.

The program which was launched was broad and comprehensive. It ramified to every corner of the earth and reached every stratum of humanity. When we began our work, George Washington was something of a myth, to many a cold impersonal figure of history, remote and almost unknown. To-day there is hardly a man, woman, or child in this land of ours but knows a great deal about George Washington. They know something of his mighty character, they know of his services, his sacrifices, his victories, and his triumphs of statesmanship. But more than that, they know of George Washington as the man. They feel a different sentiment toward him, a nearness, an understanding, a personal love.

From the least known of Americans George Washington has become one of the best known. We have succeeded in large measure at least in making him familiar to Americans for what he really was, a simple farmer, like millions of other American farmers, a business man, like many other American business men, a friend worshiped by troops of friends, a father to all the children he knew, a devoted husband, a mighty conqueror without the glamour of ambition, a statesman without selfishness—the ideal American.

I believe that if this celebration had served no other purpose than in making George Washington understood and loved, it would have been worth all the planning and all the effort.

So I have reason not only to thank the American people for their cooperation but to congratulate them from the depths of my heart for the long, earnest, self-giving efforts they themselves have put forth to make this memorial to George Washington what it should be.

During these two years of active preparation 60,000,000 people—half the population of the United States—with half a million committees to lead them, have found the time, the willingness, and the initiative to plan the great tribute which opened in the National Capital yesterday, and in cities, towns, and hamlets all over our beloved land.

But it is the 35,000,000 young Americans in our schools and colleges who have touched my heart most profoundly. It was the patriotism of these future generations of American citizens that we wished to awaken first of all to a response in love of country that has stirred me deeply.

The United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission has found it almost impossible to meet the demands for school studies of Washington. We have, however, placed his picture in every one of the 850,000 schoolrooms of the country. We have supplied these schools with literature of all kinds touching every phase of the life of George Washington. These young people have enrolled themselves with the same enthusiasm in the contests we have arranged through the year for excellence in essay, declamation, and oratory on the subject of George Washington and the Americanism he lived and taught.

Nothing could have pleased and touched George Washington himself so much as this overwhelming tribute of affection from these young Americans of to-day. Childless himself, he loved all the children that he could draw near him. Yesterday the children of a later American paid him the same homage of love in song, in parades, in every form of exercise.

This tribute from those who will love Washington all their lives and strive to be like him was one of the finest touches to the whole celebration, and I am proud to have had a hand in bringing about a stirring of hearts so deep, so fine, and so patriotic.

No greater distinction or self-satisfaction could come to any man, woman, or child than to have had a part in this inspiring work.

Throughout the months to come there will be thousands upon thousands of celebrations of all kinds throughout our country. For the most part these will be simple, inexpensive forms of tribute—the kind George Washington himself would most like. I ask the people everywhere, and especially the boys and girls, to become active in these celebrations, for everyone will have his opportunity.

Let us upon all appropriate occasions find ways of joining in these manifestations of honor to the great American, for in honoring George Washington we honor ourselves; in teaching George Washington, we are doing the most important work in the preservation of our common country.

EXPLANATION OF THE DATE AND DAY OF GEORGE WASHINGTON'S BIRTH, FEBRUARY 11, 1731, AND HOW IT CORRESPONDS WITH FEBRUARY 22, THE DATE WE CELEBRATE

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Speaker, as we celebrate the two hundredth anniversary of the birth of George Washington, it may be of interest to consider certain points with reference to our calendar, inasmuch as they have a direct bearing upon the date on which the celebration is to be held.

The use of the Julian calendar in Great Britain and her colonies, including the United States, ended with December 31, 1751, in accordance with an act of Parliament. A part of this act, as contained in Henning's Statutes at Large, Laws of Virginia, volume 1, page 394, is as follows:

So much of the act of Parliament of Twenty-fourth George II, chapter 23, as relates to the establishment of the new style, is in the following words: "Throughout all His Majesty's dominions in Europe, Asia, Africa, and America, subject to the Crown of Great Britain, the supputation according to which the year of our Lord beginneth on the 25th of March shall not be made use of after the last day of December, 1751, and the 1st day of January next following the said last day of December, shall be deemed the first day of the year of our Lord 1752, and so on, the 1st day of January in every year shall be deemed the first day of the year. And after the said 1st day of January, 1752, the days of each month shall be reckoned in the same order; and the feast of Easter, and other movable feasts thereon depending, be ascertained according to the same method, as they now are, until the 2d of September in the said year 1752, inclusive; and the natural day next immediately following the said 2d of September shall be called the 14th of September, omitting for that time only the 11 intermediate nominal days of the common calendar; and the natural days following the said 14th of September shall be numbered forward in numerical order from the said 14th of September, according to the order now used in the present calendar; and all acts, deeds, writings, notes, and other instruments executed or signed upon or after the 1st day of January, 1752, shall bear date according to the said new method of supputation, etc." The section then goes on to provide for the sessions of courts, and so forth, according to the new method.

With respect to leap years, the second section declares, "that the years 1800, 1900, 2100, 2200, 2300, or any other hundredth year of our Lord, except only every fourth hundredth year, whereof the year 2000 shall be the first, shall not be bissextile or leap years, but shall be common years, consisting of 365 days and no more; and the years of our Lord 2000, 2400, 2800, and every other fourth hundredth year of our Lord, from the year 2000, inclusive, and all other years of our Lord, which by the present supputation are bissextile or leap years, shall be bissextile, or leap years consisting of 366 days."

It is seen from the above that the year 1751 was a short year, in that it began with March 25, and ended with December 31; 1752 was also a short year, in that 11 day dates were omitted in September of that year. That is, no days were designated as September 3 to September 13, inclusive. The day immediately following Wednesday, September 2, was designated Thursday, September 14. There was no interruption of the regular succession of the days of the week.

From the foregoing, and from consideration of a known error in the Julian leap year rule, it is apparent that on bringing into our present calendar events that occurred between February 29, 1700, and September 2, 1752, both dates inclusive, and "old style," a correction of 11 days must be made because of the 11 dates omitted from September, 1752, and in addition, if the event occurred between January 1 and March 24, inclusive, the year date must be increased by one. For example, George Washington was born on February 11, 1731, according to the calendar in use in Great Britain and her colonies at the time of his birth, but on extrapolating our present calendar back to that time the date becomes February 22, 1732, and we shall celebrate the two hundredth anniversary of his birth on February 22, 1932.

Having been born on February 11, 1731, Washington was 19 years old on February 11, 1750, and 20 years on February 11 of the year following. This would have been 1751, under the old calendar, but the year 1751 ended with December 31, and the following February became February, 1752. Washington's twentieth birthday was, therefore, celebrated on February 11, 1752. In the following September, 1752, 11 day dates were omitted, so that Washington's twenty-first birthday was celebrated on February 22, 1753. From that time onward February 22 has been counted as the anniversary of his birth, and February 22, 1932, will be correctly celebrated as the two hundredth anniversary of his birth.

For many years both before and after the adoption of the Gregorian calendar in this country the practice of "double dating" was customary, or, at least, not uncommon, and sometimes led to confusion. Thus George Washington himself writing to Sir Isaac Heard, Garter King-of-Arms, May 22, 1792, thus recorded his own birth:

"Augustine then married (Mary) Ball, March 6th, 1730; by whom he had issue George, born February 11th (old style), 1732"; meaning 1731/32. This slip has caused some people to claim that he was born in 1732/33.

This practice of double dating was necessary before the adoption in order to avoid uncertainty in official records, correspondence, and especially in documents relating to foreign trade, because of the fact that the Gregorian calendar was in use in Catholic countries from 1582 onward and its use in these countries was recognized in Great Britain and her colonies, although it was not put into effect in Great Britain and her colonies until January 1, 1752. After the adoption, double dating was also used, presumably to eliminate all possibility of confusion which might have resulted from inertia in changing calendars, but the practice soon died out.

Of special interest in this connection is the fact that the Washington family Bible, now at Mount Vernon, records the birth of George Washington in the following manner:

George Washington, son of Augustine and Mary, his wife, was born ye 11th day of February, 1731/2.

ECONOMY COMMITTEE

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I call up House Resolution 151.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

House Resolution 151

Whereas the annual operating expenses of the Federal Government have increased approximately $1,000,000,000 within the span of the last decade; and

Whereas the industrial depression under which the country, its industries, and its people are now and have been suffering has substantially reduced the revenue accruing to the United States; and

Whereas in addition to a cumulated deficit of over $3,000,000,000 for the years 1931 and 1932 there is an estimated deficit of $1,250,000,000 for the year 1933, exclusive of debt-retirement requirements; and

Whereas the estimated deficit for 1933 must be eliminated and the Budget balanced not only by increasing the tax burden but also by the practice of economy and the elimination of appropriations for objects not now necessary and essential to the orderly and requisite activities of government: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Speaker of the House of Representatives be, and he is hereby, authorized to appoint a select committee of seven Members of the House of Representatives, to be known as the Economy Committee, to consist of the chairman and at least one minority member of the Committee on Appropriations, and the chairman and at least one minority member of the Committee on Expenditures in Executive Departments, and the remainder at his discretion, for the purpose of investigating the economies in the Federal Government which may be effected without impairing the necessary functions of government; be it further

Resolved, That said Economy Committee shall conduct its investigations in cooperation with the Committee on Appropriations and the Committee on Expenditures in Executive Departments, shall submit its recommendations of economies to be effected and its recommendations, if any, on the organization of government to the House of Representatives on or before April 15, 1932; be it further

Resolved, That said Economy Committee shall have the authority to use as assistants employees of the Federal Government, to take testimony, to call upon the heads of the various executive departments, bureaus, commissions, and their employees for information, and shall be authorized to sit during sessions of the House of Representatives.

With the following committee amendment: Strike out all of the preamble.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I wish to yield to the gentleman from Indiana one-half of the time, to be in turn yielded by him. I yield to myself eight minutes.

Mr. Speaker, during the 50 working days in this Congress we have passed the so-called moratorium, the Reconstruction Finance Corporation measure, the Steagall-Glass bill, and the Jones bill for the relief of agriculture and livestock corporations.

The resolution before the House might be considered supplemental to the program which has already been enacted into law. The bill provides for the creation of a committee of seven, and the formula under which that committee will work is the investigation of economies in the Federal Government which do not impair the necessary functions of the Government. The jurisdiction conferred is therefore very broad.

I believe that this committee will find on the very threshold of their work that they have a Herculean job before them. It has been found to be easier to vote money out of the Treasury than it is to abolish useless and unnecessary offices.

Almost 30 years ago I heard Senator Aldrich in the Senate make the statement that if the Government were administered in a business manner $300,000,000 a year could be saved. Since that time there have been repeated efforts made toward effecting economies, but steadily the cost of Government has mounted, and this committee will find that there will be many unforeseen obstacles in the way of the work that has been cut out for them in this resolution.

It will take courage to do this job, but I believe that this committee of seven that the Speaker will appoint will be equal to the emergency, and that they will come back here with a report, no matter whom it hurts, by the 15th of April which will save this Government many millions of dollars. [Applause.] Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. PURNELL. Mr. Speaker, I hope it is unnecessary for me to state that we on this side of the aisle are just as anxious as those who bring in this resolution to effect substantial economies in Government.

I hope it is unnecessary to state that we are willing to go to any reasonable length to bring about that which we all so earnestly desire, namely, a balanced Budget.

I voted for this resolution in the Rules Committee, and I shall vote for it to-day. I do so, however, with a feeling of sincere regret. Any fair-minded Member must realize that this is little more than another gesture. I shall vote for it because it is the only proposal we shall have an opportunity to vote upon.

Just what is proposed? This resolution authorizes the appointment by the Speaker of a select committee of seven to be known as the Economy Committee. It is charged with the duty of investigating economies in the Federal Government, which may be effected without impairing necessary functions of the Government. It is also charged with the duty of making recommendations touching upon the reorganization of Government. Under the terms of the resolution this select committee must report its findings and submit these recommendations not later than April 15, 1932. I submit that no seven men in the country working night and day can hope to intelligently deal with both of these questions and make a report in six weeks' time.

If we must have a congressional committee make this investigation I submit that it would be preferable to have a joint committee of the two bodies of Congress rather than a special committee from either branch. When this committee of seven shall have completed its work, that which they recommend, that which they seek to accomplish, must not only be reconsidered by legislative committees of this House, but the work must also be reviewed and considered by the Senate. A joint committee answerable to both bodies and representative of both bodies would, in my judgment, bring final action more quickly than can possibly be hoped for under this proposal.

Personally, I should prefer to see the President given the authority which he has asked for and permit him to effect such economies and reorganization. He has stated plainly that if given the power he would do it.

Much has been said lately concerning the attitude of the President upon the subject of economy and reorganization of the executive departments. There is no confusion on this side of the aisle as to his purposes and desires. In order that those who pretend to hold some doubt as to his position I wish to call attention to the following extracts from addresses and messages made by the President from time to time since 1920 upon the question of the reorganization of the Government.

From an address before the American Institute of Mining Engineers, Minneapolis, Minn., August 26, 1920:

The second step is to determine that our Government will be a government of cooperation, limiting profits surely, but holding to individual initiative as the single hope of human development. In order that we shall have some central point in the Federal Government where these problems may be adequately considered, from which they can be ventilated for the verdict of public opinion, where the business brains of the country can be called into conference and cooperation with the Government, and therefore with the people, the engineers of the United States have proposed time and time again that a Cabinet department should be established in Washington, either new or to replace the Interior Department, to which should be assigned the whole question of public works. You are familiar enough with the advantages of such a department from an everyday administration point of view, and enormous saving to the Government from the duplication or competition of the six or seven departments now engaged in engineering construction work of this character, but on this occasion I wish to call your attention to the fact that such a department has become an essential from the point of view of proper consideration and presentation to the American people of these broader national engineering problems upon which the next generation must depend if our country is to march forward.

From an address at the Engineers' Council dinner, Philadelphia, April 16, 1921:

There is one problem of the new administration that has received the attention and thought of the organized engineers of America for many years past. This is the problem of the reorganization of the Federal Government. The inadequacy, the wastefulness, and the inefficiency of our Federal organization was evident enough under pre-war conditions. These inadequacies, these inefficiencies, these wastes were exhibited to the country during the war at the cost of millions.

To any student of Federal organization, one sweeping and fundamental necessity stands out above all others, and that is that the administrative units of the Government must be regrouped so as to give each of the great departments more nearly a single purpose. The hodgepodge of aims in certain administrative branches is scarcely believable when we consider our national pride and skill in organization. Such functions as public domain, public works, assistance to veterans, public-health functions, aids to navigation, to industry, to trade, purchasing of major supplies, are each and every one scattered over from four to eight departments, most of which are devoted to some other major purpose.

We have also some confusion between executive, advisory, and semijudicial functions. One of the tendencies of Government, both local and national, during the last 20 years has been to add executive functions to commissions and boards created primarily for advisory or regulatory purposes. It requires no argument with our business public that the executive functions can not rise to high efficiency in the hands of Government boards where from the very nature of things each member has a separate responsibility to the public and is primarily engaged in a semijudicial function.

Furthermore, during the last few years, there has been a great growth of independent agencies in the Government reporting directly to the President until his office is overburdened almost beyond the point of endurance. The original and sound conception was that the executive functions should be reported up to the President directly through his Cabinet officials. Not only do these outside functions to-day overburden the President, but they render coordination with executive departments extremely difficult. It is neither possible nor advisable to place all these outside organizations into the departments, but much could be done to mitigate the situation.

Letter to Mr. Walter F. Brown, Joint Committee on Reorganization of Administrative Branch of the Government, Washington, D. C., April 7, 1924:

I understand the question before your committee is as to the transfer of the whole of the Shipping Board functions to the Department of Commerce. In this memorandum you will see that I have suggested a separation of the Shipping Board functions into those of semijudicial regulatory order and those of purely executive or administrative order, which I have suggested should be transferred to the Emergency Fleet Corporation; that the Emergency Fleet Corporation should be equipped with a president selected by the President of the United States, a board of directors that would secure coordination of the different branches of the Government.

Extracts from testimony at the hearings before the Joint Committee on the Reorganization of the Administrative Branch of the Government, January 22, 1924:

There are certain essential principles that should be laid down as to administrative relations in these governmental activities.

First, administrative and executive functions can not be carried out by boards. The proper and useful functions for boards are in semijudicial, regulatory or advisory, nor can advisory functions as to administrative matters be carried out by the same board as regulatory functions without destroying both values.

Second, the actual business of operating ships to be economical and successful must be concentrated in the usual form of business organization with a responsible president at the head and with a board of directors of advisory character.

Third, the other Government relations to merchant marine, such as aids to navigation, governmental control of ships and crews, safety and promotion functions in relation to the American merchant marine as a whole should be concentrated so as to stop overlap, waste, and unnecessary drain upon the industry.

II

The Shipping Board should have its functions reduced to purely regulatory functions over rates, combinations, and discriminations. It should act impartially toward all ships private or public and have the same independence as the Interstate Commerce Commission. It should have no advisory or administrative functions in relation to Government fleet or the administration of it.

III

There should be created an under secretary of merchant marine in the Department of Commerce. The following bureaus and functions of the Government should be transferred to a new division of merchant marine with an under secretary of the merchant marine, in the Department of Commerce. The following bureaus and functions of the Government should be transferred to this new division:

1. Coast and Geodetic Survey (now in Commerce).
2. Bureau of Navigation (now in Commerce).
3. Steamboat Inspection Service (now in Commerce).
4. Bureau of Lighthouses (now in Commerce).
5. Hydrographic Office (now in Navy Department).
6. National Observatory (now in Navy Department).
7. Life-saving stations (now a portion of the Coast Guard).
8. Steamship anchorage control (now in War Department).
9. Great Lakes Survey (now in War Department).
10. Marine division of customs houses (now partly under Treasury and under Commerce).
11. Admeasurement of vessels (now in Treasury).
12. Commerce statistics (now in War Department).
13. Inland barge service (now in War Department).

Authority should be given to the Secretary of Commerce to consolidate any of the above functions and to redistribute any of them in new bureau grouping. Activities of these bureaus in their contacts with ships should be concentrated as nearly as possible under one official at each port. An immediate saving of more than a million dollars a year could be made in administration costs by the elimination of duplication, but this is of trivial importance compared to the expense now imposed upon the shipping industry through the necessity to maintain contact and secure directions and service from all these bureaus. For instance, this concentration of functions would permit masters of vessels to attend at one office in each port to make contact with 9 or 10 separate officials as is now necessary.

There must obviously be some well-defined and accepted principle as the basis for any plan of reorganization. It is also a certainty that the administrative reorganization must be based purely on practical considerations. The sole end is the accomplishment of the greatest efficiency and economy. Thus it appears to me that the major principle in reorganization must be the grouping of Government functions solely according to their major purpose. If all of the different functions that are driving toward some particular service, whether the Army, Navy, public health, public works, agricultural production, public domain, or merchant marine, can be put into groups, cheek by jowl with each other under the same control, then the overlaps can be planed out, but it can be done in no other way. This is in fact the most primary principle of organization and exists in practically every other institution in the United States except the Federal Government.

I wish to emphasize that in reorganization the important thing is to assemble the various functions of Government relating to the particular purpose in the groups. Some of these groups will be large enough to comprise an entire department, such as the Army or Navy, the Treasury or the Department of Justice, the Department of State or the Post Office or Agricultural production. Others of these groups are not large enough to warrant the establishment of special departments with the accompanying addition to the Cabinet. It is, therefore, necessary to establish three or four of the lesser-sized groups in some of the departments. It is entirely secondary as to what Cabinet officer these groups are placed under. The important thing is to have the functions and fractions of functions in the Government brought together in groups according to their purpose. As I have said, if they are brought cheek by jowl together, it is then possible to consolidate them into large bureaus, wiping out their overlaps, and to place them under single-headed direction.

These secondary groups should be headed by an assistant secretary or an under secretary for the group. These men would in the ordinary course be chosen because of their fitness for that sort of group. Men of experience and national standing would be available for undersecretaryships. They would greatly strengthen the whole organism both in administration and in assistance to Congress in general policies.

It would appear to me, therefore, that the first process in reorganization would be to strip the Treasury Department, the War and Navy Departments, and the Department of Agriculture of all of the functions which do not pertain to their major purpose as their major purpose is sufficiently large to tax the capacity of any one organization. There are perhaps some independent activities that should be added to these departments as being a part of their major purpose.

The second step in conception of reorganization would seem to me to be to take all of the functions that would be thus removed from the above departments, together with all of the functions in the Departments of the Interior, Commerce, and Labor, and all of the independent executive establishments which can be placed under departmental control and to divide them into groups according to the major purpose of such groups. It will be found that they naturally fall into certain groups not large enough to comprise each one in itself a department but in which departments can be created of three or four groups having some general affinity in purpose between groups.

In view of the accumulation of resistance which will come from Government officials to any grouping, obvious from the hearings before this committee and the propaganda in the country by interested bureaus against such groupings and reorganization, it will be extremely difficult to secure a precise set-up by congressional action. Plausible arguments are made pro and con which can only confuse the Members of Congress who are not able to give the time and attention necessary to get to the bottom of these questions. Furthermore, a complete rearrangement of organization to-day would require amendment again to-morrow. New functions and new activities are constantly under creation by Congress to meet the tides of necessity.

I would, therefore, like to make a suggestion as to the method by which this matter could be handled with more certainty of success and assurance of accuracy not only at the present moment but for the future. This suggestion is that Congress should give authority to the President to make such changes within the limits of certain defined principles as may be recommended to him by an independent commission to be created by Congress and clothed with these authorities. The broad principle of grouping by major purpose could be laid down by legislation, and the major purposes of the departments could be likewise defined. The groups according to major purpose could be enumerated by legislation and the groups assigned to departments. Then the details of transfer of individual bureaus and functions to meet these principles could be left to the President, upon the recommendation of such a commission.

Address before the Thirteenth Annual Meeting of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States, May 21, 1925:

Over many years our people have been striving to better the Federal administration. We have succeeded in two major steps; we still have a third equally important and perhaps more difficult one to accomplish. The first step was the establishment of Government employment based upon merit; the second was the establishment of adequate control of appropriations through the Budget system. There still remains the third and even more important step to relieve the taxpayer of a greater but more obscure waste—that resulting from faulty organization of administrative functions. And the first two steps will never reach the full realization without the third.

In recent years, under the leadership of the President and with the cooperation of Congress, we have been successfully slashing Federal expenditures by the elimination of extravagances and unnecessary personnel. But for lack of legislative authority we have not been able to reach into what I believe is an even larger waste and larger drain on the taxpayer than extravagance and the inflation of pay rolls—the waste which arises from the swamp of bad organization.

On the executive side of the Federal Government we have grown to have more than 200 different bureaus, boards, and commissions with a total of 550,000 employees. For the most part they have been thrown hodgepodge into 10 different executive departments, under Cabinet officers. But there are more than 40 independent establishments either directly under the President or directly under Congress.

As these 200 bureaus and agencies are now grouped and organized there are two primary streams of confusion and waste. There is a confusion of basic principles; there is a grouping of Federal bureaus which divides responsibility. There consequently arises a lack of definite national policies, and direct wastes arise from overlap and conflict. Indirectly large costs are imposed upon citizens by this scattering of functions, and I may add, by the undue complexity of our laws and regulations of independent agencies. There are too many floating islands in this dismal swamp. They are technically anchored to the President, but really responsible to nobody. With all this division of authority there continues and multiplies a self-propelled urge for expansion of Federal activities in every direction.

The Shipping Board—to cite a glaring case—was originally created as a body to regulate rates and abolish discrimination in ocean-going traffic. These are semijudicial functions that quite properly were intrusted to a board. Political jealousies and sectional jealousies, however, resulted in a bipartisan body selected from different parts of the country although it was to perform an expert judicial function. Then this structure was suddenly loaded with the most difficult of administrative jobs—the actual construction and operation of the greatest single merchant fleet in history. The losses and waste which have resulted from this blunder of assigning executive and administrative functions to the joint and equal minds of a wrongly constructed semijudicial body have amounted to perhaps a few hundred millions out of the three billion we have lost on shipping, but beyond this the impossibility of a continuous merchant-marine policy has worked great losses upon our privately owned merchant marine. Nor can we properly blame the individual member of the Shipping Board. Not even two geniuses of equal authority could administer a competitive business, let alone seven. There are other breeds of this same sort of confusion between individual and joint responsibility. The Federal Board for Vocational Education, the Federal Power Commission, and other agencies likewise are mixed functions.

Every single department, bureau, and board in the entire Government should be placed upon the operating table and a clean-cut separation established between semijudicial and semilegislative functions on the one hand and of administration on the other. The former rightly belongs to boards or commissions, the latter to individuals. For instance, the semijudicial and semilegislative functions arising from the navigation laws should be transferred to a properly constituted Shipping Board, leaving matters of administration of such decisions to the Department of Commerce.

DIVISION OF AUTHORITY IN ADMINISTRATIVE AGENCIES

Our other greatest weakness in organization is the division of authority over services directed to the same major purpose by scattering them through unrelated groups. Needless to say some of the 10 executive departments are fairly homogeneously devoted to a particular major purpose—notably the Department of Justice, the Navy Department, the State Department, the Department of Agriculture, and the Post Office Department. But all the others, and even some of these, contain functions that should be transferred elsewhere. And there is hardly a department that should not, when it gives up these functions which are without relation to its major purpose, receive in exchange functions which properly belong in its jurisdiction but which are now performed by other departments.

To illustrate my point, I have made a partial collection of misfits and in so doing I have taken no account of either incidental functions or semilegislative or semijudicial agencies, except so far as they have administrative functions.

	Number of bureaus or agencies	Number of departments or independent agencies in which they are located
Public works construction	14	9
Conservation of national resources	8	5

Direct aids to merchant marine	14	6

Public health	4	2
Purchase of $250,000,000 of supplies annually	(1)	(1)

[1] In every bureau of the Government.

It is not necessary that each of these groups should become a whole executive department, each under a Cabinet officer; but it is entirely feasible to place each one of them under the supervision of a special assistant secretary, and if we were truly intelligent we would class him as an expert and outside selection on political grounds. It is entirely secondary what department these groups are in. The big thing is to bring these kindred agencies together under one leadership, so that their overlapping edges can be clipped and their fights stopped. No one familiar with the internal workings of the departments will deny the direct waste which comes from overlap and friction as the result of the present lack of coordination of activities. Coordination is feasible when some one person is responsible; with divided authority among the different branches of government it is a hypothesis that evaporated soon after the perennial conferences of Cabinet officers on the subject. It all costs somebody money. One of the favorite indoor sports of our newspaper correspondents is to ventilate these conflicts.

The divided responsibility with absence of centralized authority prevents the constructive and consistent development of broad national policies in these special branches of governmental activity, for there is by necessity of this division constant conflict of view within the Government itself. Under the present system we have different bureau policies, department policies, board policies, and commission policies. We have a bundle of divergent ideas without focus; lumber piled together does not make a house. The treatment of our national resources furnishes a good instance. If anything is certain, it is that the Government should have a continuous, definite, and consistent policy directed to intelligent conservation and use of national resources. But it can have no such policy so long as responsibility is split up among half a dozen different departments. The recent occurrences in oil leases are a fair example of what may happen by the lack of single-headed responsibility in such matters. No policy of real guardianship of our reserve resources will exist until we put all conservation business in the hands of an under secretary for conservation, with the spotlight of public opinion continuously upon him.

THE INDEPENDENT AGENCIES

The 40 governmental agencies which are now supposed to function directly under the President present another problem. Here we have four breeds which might be classified according to the functions they perform: The semijudicial, the semilegislative, the service bureaus to all departments, and the straight administrative. Often enough they are mixed. They are supposed to act under the direct supervision of the President, but it is preposterous to expect that, with his multitude of higher obligations, the President can give them anything like adequate supervision. As a matter of fact, these independent establishments conduct their activities with very little supervision or coordination. The last group, the straight administrative, expend nearly half a billion a year—as much as the total of five of the departments under Cabinet officers. If for no other reason, this group should be placed directly in the departments, in order that the President may exercise, through his Cabinet, the guidance and control of the administrative arm of the Government. And the President, already overworked in major policies, must be relieved of detail.

IN GENERAL

What we need is three primary reforms: First, to group together all agencies having the same predominant major purpose under the same administrative supervision; second, to separate the semijudicial and the semilegislative and advisory functions from the administrative functions, placing the former under joint minds, the latter under single responsibility; and third, we should relieve the President of a vast amount of direct administrative labor.

Every President from Roosevelt to Coolidge has urged upon Congress a reorganization of the executive arm of the Government; commissions have been appointed, congressional committees have investigated, reports have been made, confirming all this. Cabinet officers express their feelings in spirited annual reports with a circulation of a few hundred copies. More than once a complete program of reorganization has been formulated and put forward as a basis for general consideration.

But practically every single item in such a program has invariably met with opposition of some vested official, or it has disturbed some vested habit, and offended some organized minority. It has aroused the paid propagandists. All these vested officials, vested habits, organized propaganda groups, are in favor of every item of reorganization except that which affects the bureau or the activity in which they are specially interested. No proposed change is so unimportant that it is not bitterly opposed by some one. In the aggregate, these directors of vested habits surround Congress with a confusing fog of opposition. Meantime, the inchoate voice of the public gets nowhere but to swear at "bureaucracy."

Nor will we ever attain reorganization until Congress will give actual authority to the President or some board, if you will, or a committee of its own members to do it. It is of no purpose to investigate again and report. We have had years of investigation and every investigation has resulted in some recommended action. Congressional committees have for many sessions and even so late as the last session reported out important recommendations. What is needed is the actual delegation of authority to act. Congress courageously removed the civil service from politics; created the Budget; it established the classification. The remaining great step is to authorize somebody to reorganize the administrative arm of the Government.

Nor is Congress to be blamed for this situation, as it is impossible for such an overworked body to study directly and act upon the overwhelming detail involved. Nor is it possible for a great body like this to determine the right and wrong of a thousand clamors. I do not expect that the Federal Government will ever be a model of organization, but I have aspirations to see it improve.

From the address of acceptance of the Republican nomination for President, August 11, 1928:

One of the greatest difficulties of business with government is the multitude of unnecessary contacts with Government bureaus, the uncertainty and inconsistency of Government policies, and the duplication of governmental activities. A large part of this is due to the scattering of functions and the great confusion of responsibility in our Federal organization. We have, for instance, 14 different bureaus or agencies engaged in public works and construction, located in 9 different departments of the Government. It brings about competition between Government agencies, inadequacy of control, and a total lack of coordinated policies in public works. We have eight different bureaus and agencies charged with conservation of our natural resources, located in five different departments of the Government. These conditions exist in many other directions. Divided responsibility, with the absence of centralized authority, prevents constructive and consistent development of broad national policies.

Our Republican Presidents have repeatedly recommended to Congress that it would not only greatly reduce expenses of business in their contacts with government but that a great reduction could be made in governmental expenditure and more consistent and continued national policies could be developed if we could secure the grouping of these agencies devoted to one major purpose under single responsibility and authority. I have had the good fortune to be able to carry out such reorganization in respect to the Department of Commerce. The results have amply justified its expansion to other departments and I should consider it an obligation to enlist the support of Congress to effect it.

Message to Congress, June 6, 1929:

To the Congress of the United States:

In order to secure the utmost expedition in the reorganization and concentration of responsibility in administration of the Federal bureaus connected with prohibition enforcement, so greatly needed to improve their effectiveness, I recommend that Congress appoint a joint select committee to make an immediate study of these matters and to formulate recommendations for consideration at the next regular session.

I shall be glad to appoint a committee from the departments to cooperate with such a committee of the Congress. The National Commission on Law Observance and Enforcement will also cooperate through their studies of the departmental organizations.

The subject involves the transfer of parts of various bureaus and agencies from certain departments to others and it includes as well the necessity for the unification and strengthening of our border patrols, both in connection with prohibition and illegal entry of aliens. As the question embraces numerous laws and regulations in several bureaus, it will require extensive consideration, which if given jointly by such committees of the Congress and the departments prior to the regular session will save many months of delay.

From the message to Congress of December 3, 1929:

DEPARTMENTAL REORGANIZATION

This subject has been under consideration for over 20 years. It was promised by both political parties in the recent campaign. It has been repeatedly examined by committees and commissions—congressional, executive, and voluntary. The conclusions of these investigations have been unanimous that reorganization is a necessity of sound administration, of economy, of more effective governmental policies, and of relief to the citizen from unnecessary harassment in his relations with a multitude of scattered governmental agencies. But the presentation of any specific plan at once enlivens opposition from every official whose authority may be curtailed, or who fears his position is imperiled by such a result; of bureaus and departments with which to maintain their authority and activities; of citizens and their organizations who are selfishly interested, or who are inspired by fear that their favorite bureau may, in a new setting, be less subject to their influence or more subject to some other influence.

It seems to me that the essential principles of reorganization are two in number: First, all administrative activities of the same major purpose should be placed in groups under single-headed responsibility; second, all executive and administrative functions should be separated from boards and commissions and placed under individual responsibility, while quasi legislative and quasi judicial and broadly advisory functions should be removed from individual authority and assigned to boards and commissions. Indeed, these are the fundamental principles upon which our Government was founded, and they are the principles which have been adhered to in the whole development of our business structure, and they are the distillation of the common sense of generations.

For instance, the conservation of national resources is spread among eight agencies in five departments. They suffer from conflict and overlap. There is no proper development and adherence to broad national policies and no central point where the searchlight of public opinion may concentrate itself. These functions should be grouped under the direction of some such official as an assistant secretary of conservation. The particular department or cabinet officer under which such a group should be placed is of secondary importance to the need of concentration. The same may be said of educational services, of merchant marine aids, of public works, of public health, of veterans' services, and many others, the component parts of which are widely scattered in the various departments and independent agencies. It is desirable that we first have experience with these different groups in action before we create new departments. These may be necessary later on.

With this background of all previous experience I can see no hope for the development of a sound reorganization of the Government unless Congress be willing to delegate its authority over the problem—subject to defined principles—to the Executive, who should act upon approval of a joint committee of Congress or with the reservation of power of revision by Congress within some limited period adequate for its consideration.

From the statement at the newspaper conference of July 8, 1930:

One of the most important steps taken in reorganization of the Federal Government was the legislation carrying out my recommendation for a consolidation of all veterans' agencies—that is, the Veterans' Bureau, an independent establishment, the Pension Bureau from the Department of the Interior, and the Soldiers' Home from the War Department.

From the message to Congress of December 8, 1931:

REORGANIZATION OF FEDERAL DEPARTMENTS

I have referred in previous messages to the profound need of further reorganization and consolidation of Federal administrative functions to eliminate overlap and waste and to enable coordination and definition of Government policies now wholly impossible in scattered and conflicting agencies which deal with parts of the same major function. I shall lay before the Congress further recommendations upon this subject, particularly in relation to the Department of the Interior. There are two directions of such reorganization, however, which have an important bearing upon the emergency problems with which we are confronted.

SHIPPING BOARD

At present the Shipping Board exercises large administrative functions independent of the Executive. These administrative functions should be transferred to the Department of Commerce, in keeping with that single responsibility which has been the basis of our governmental structure since its foundation. There should be created in that department a position of assistant secretary for merchant marine, under whom this work and the several bureaus having to do with the merchant marine may be grouped.

The Shipping Board should be made a regulatory body, acting also in advisory capacity on loans and policies, in keeping with its original conception. Its regulatory powers should be amended to include regulation of coastwise shipping so as to assure stability and better service. It is also worthy of consideration that the regulation of rates and services upon the inland waterways should be assigned to such a reorganized board.

REORGANIZATION OF PUBLIC WORKS ADMINISTRATION

I recommend that all building and construction activities of the Government now carried on by many departments be consolidated into an independent establishment under the President to be known as the public works administration, directed by a public works administrator. This agency should undertake all construction work in service to the different departments of the Government (except naval and military work). The services of the Corps of Army Engineers should be delegated in rotation for military duty to this administration in continuation of their supervision of river and harbor work. Greater economies, sounder policies, more effective coordination to employment, and expedition in all construction work would result from this consolidation.

From the statement at the newspaper conference of December 29, 1931:

The most constructive direction for economy in Federal expenditure beyond a rigid reduction of appropriations and the resolute opposition to new appropriations lies in the consolidation of Government bureaus and general reorganization of the Federal Government. I have recommended this reorganization in public addresses, reports, and messages to Congress throughout the past 10 years.

I particularly emphasized this necessity as the basis of constructive economy in my message to the second session of the Seventy-first Congress. I again referred to it in the message to the third session of that Congress, and in my message to the present Congress I again traversed the subject. Some of my recommendations have been carried out, the most notable one being the consolidation of all veterans' activities into the Veterans' Administration. As a result, General Hines reports that we are saving somewhere from ten to fifteen millions a year in this service alone.

Outstanding amongst these reorganizations would be consolidation of all construction activities of the Government under an administrator of public works, to serve all the departments. Other cases are the consolidation of all Merchant Marine activities into the Department of Commerce; the consolidation of the conservation activities of the Government; of the public-health services, of educational activities, and numerous other groups on the same major purpose under single-headed responsibility. Such action would result in the elimination of many expensive agencies and overlap, resulting in very great economies. These economies would run into many millions.

In addition to the actual economy by concentrated administration and elimination of overlap, further great economies would be brought about through the curtailment of the self-expanding capacity of scattered bureaus which could be much better controlled if they were grouped together. It would enable policies in connection with different Government activities to be better developed and better directed.

The subject is an old one and now that economy absolutely must be the first order in Government, it is an appropriate time for Congress to take up this question and bring it to conclusion. Such action would comprise a major accomplishment of the present session of Congress.

A careful reading of the above must convince the most skeptical that the President has been and still is in dead earnest in his desire to bring about a workable reorganization with an attendant reduction in governmental expenditures.

That we must have more economy in Government is no longer debatable. No government can long endure whose budget remains out of balance. It is our immediate duty to find the best method by which we can balance our own. With that thought in our minds we on this side of the aisle shall join with you on the other side of the aisle in every honest effort you may make looking toward a reduction in governmental expenditures and a reorganization of the Government.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I yield seven minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN].

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, before proceeding with a discussion of this resolution I refer briefly to the remarks of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS]. I will state that the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments has held hearings upon the bill to create a Department of National Defense. It was only introduced January 5. The hearings were closed last Thursday. On Saturday an executive session was held. Suggestions were made at the hearings which the committee thought should be considered, and very properly so. After discussing the matter at some length the committee voted to refer the two bills to a subcommittee of five, to make such changes, if any changes are necessary, and report the bills back to the full committee.

It matters not to me whether the Speaker of the House or the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations are for this legislation. I do not propose to railroad such a bill through the committee. I do not propose to destroy the future usefulness of that committee by taking such action. [Applause.] I want this bill to be properly considered, and I want every member of the committee who is opposed to it to have a fair opportunity, in executive session, to speak their views upon the bill. That is orderly procedure.

If gentlemen will wait just a few days, I think we will have a vote upon the bill in the committee.

They are asking a committee to do something in 6 weeks that certain Members of Congress have been trying to do for 30 years, and I think it is unfair to try to rush us in the consideration of that measure.

I am in favor of the bill, and I think if properly administered it will, as the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] says, save this country millions upon millions. I am convinced that there is duplication and overlapping that can be eliminated by proper administration; but, Mr. Speaker, this bill does not affect two small bureaus of the Government, it affects two great departments of the Government; and while hearings have been held on similar bills on many occasions in the past members of this committee were not present at those hearings. Why, the hearings have not as yet been received from the printers. They have just been sent there and will be ready by Saturday. Even if the bill was in, it would not displace the appropriation bill that is waiting and is booked for consideration. Just let us handle this matter in a proper way; and, I think, if you do the bill will get along better when it reaches the floor. This committee has a duty to perform, and it desires to perform it in an orderly way. It has some responsibility in this matter.

Mr. Speaker, every Member of Congress recognizes the necessity of reducing Government expenditures. I favor the passage of this resolution because I feel it will enable the Congress to secure information that will help the House to act intelligently upon this important question. [Applause.]

My purpose in rising here this morning, however, is to direct the attention of the Members to what is going on behind the scenes. The official spokesman in this House of the President on matters affecting appropriations, Mr. WOOD, of Indiana, told us last week that he was authorized to say that the President stood squarely behind the Appropriations Committee in its action in further reducing appropriations below the estimates of the Bureau of the Budget. That was most pleasing information, but at the time Mr. WOOD was making this statement we find the Secretary of Agriculture and his aides before the Senate Committee on Appropriations making an argument which resulted in that committee eliminating from the agriculture appropriation bill the proviso that would have resulted in reducing the personnel by preventing the filling of vacancies and preventing promotions which would have saved the Government millions of dollars.

I call attention now to the activities of two other members of the President's Cabinet by reading an editorial printed last week in a great metropolitan newspaper, a responsible newspaper, the St. Louis Star:

PROPAGANDA AGAINST ECONOMY

A queer spectacle is presented at Washington, with President Hoover and Congress trying to save money while Cabinet members and subordinates in the departments flood the country with propaganda in opposition to the economy program.

The day's mail brings the Star a press release from the Department of the Interior telling how Secretary Wilbur is protesting against the $500,000 saving in appropriations for the "survey of the public domain." He seems to think the country will go to pot if a surveying job which began in 1785 and has been in progress for 147 years is slowed down for a year or two. The work, he says, "is largely in the wild country where the chuck wagon and the pack mule still survive." Better turn the pack mule out to graze. It'll be better off than a lot of taxpayers.

The same mail brings a form letter from the War Department asking for an editorial protest against the temporary suspension of citizens' military training camps by the President and Congress, and containing the gentle suggestion that such training is particularly needed just now because of "the undercurrent of unrest." What does the War Department have in mind, to train young civilians to shoot the unemployed when they get too hungry? These training camps perform a fine service in their normal activities, but why insist on them in a year when the National Treasury faces a $2,000,000,000 deficit?

Incidentally, the Federal departments could save a little money by ceasing to send out propaganda against economy.

Think of it, Mr. Speaker, the taxpayers' money being used for the purpose of undermining the efforts of the President and Members of Congress who seek to reduce Government expenditures. Three Cabinet officers within a week using their efforts to set aside the will of their chief.

Mr. Speaker, yesterday in every corner of our country exercises were held commemorating the anniversary of the birth of Gen. George Washington. Orators spoke of his many fine qualities, but his outstanding achievements resulted from his ability to lead and in possessing the courage to bring to a successful conclusion the policies that he advocated. [Applause.]

Washington was faced with the same situation when he became President that confronts us to-day. He was required to find ways to place the country on a sound financial footing. He had as advisers the great Hamilton and the great Jefferson, but when the final decision was reached it was Washington's decision. What would have happened in those hectic days had our first President permitted his Cabinet to oppose his efforts?

Mr. Speaker, what we need to-day is leadership backed by courage, and if the President will assume that leadership and he has the courage to serve notice on his Cabinet officers that they must back his and the Congress's action on appropriations, the objective, a reduction in Government expenditures, will be much easier accomplished. [Applause.]

The same applies to the reorganization of Government departments. Here, like on appropriations, we find recommendations coming from the White House and opposition from the Cabinet. How long is such a deplorable state of affairs going to be permitted to exist? [Applause.]

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL].

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, as far as the general purpose of this resolution is concerned, I am just as much in favor of it as any Member of the House. If there is any possible way whereby we can do away with duplication or overlapping of work and duties in the various executive departments and bureaus, I am absolutely in favor of it. During my entire service in this House I probably have voted more often against the creation of extra bureaus and extraneous appropriations than any other man, so that I do not have to take any different position to-day from what I have always taken on the floor of the House.

The resolution as presented at the present time, I think, is much better than the original resolution presented by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS], because this resolution does to a certain extent recognize the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments, which committee was set up as a standing committee of the House for the distinct purpose of doing just exactly what you want this special committee to do at the present time. If we had adopted the original resolution, it would have been necessary for this Congress to say that the standing committee of the House was absolutely incompetent to do that for which it was specially set up, and to a certain extent you have overcome that by recognizing the chairman of that committee and at least one minority member of it, which really is only a gesture; but, as has been stated by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. PURNELL], if you want to accomplish the object of this resolution, you should provide for a joint committee of the House and Senate, because it is absolutely impossible to change the law, and to do that you are seeking to do without the cooperation of the Senate. These bureaus and independent offices were set up by statute, and you must repeal some of the laws to do away with them.

Let us see what the resolution provides: In line 16, on page 2, we find that this committee—> shall submit its recommendations of economies to be effected and its recommendations, if any, on the organization of Government to the House of Representatives on or before April 15, 1932.

After that is done, the natural thing to do is to refer the recommendations to the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments. In other words, we must take those recommendations and put them right back where it is proper for them to have been commenced at the present time. That committee then must go over them, examine them, and present bills to the House to carry out these recommendations before you can accomplish your purpose.

In other words, we must have the recommendations reviewed by the regular standing committee. If the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments is not the proper committee to make the investigation at the present time, it is certainly not the proper committee to look over the recommendations and present a bill to the House carrying out the same.

Mr. SCHAFER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. Not just now.

The President sent a special message to the House in which he said there was duplication and overlapping of jurisdiction and work; that there were many remedies that could be made. He said in that message that if you gave him the power to do it he would do it. Now, if you really mean what you say and you want to cut down this duplication and overlapping, why not give the President the power that he asks for and put the proposition squarely on his doorstep and demand that we get results? That, it seems to me, is the proper method of procedure. That is one procedure we can follow out that will put the responsibility where it belongs.

This is an executive matter. Let us put it up to the President and say to him, "You have told us this can be done if you have the authority to do it, and we give you that authority and we want you to show results."

If we will do that, we will get some definite results; but in this program it is absolutely impossible to accomplish anything during this session.

It may be possible to get something passed through the House, but the only thing to do is to follow the recommendation of the President and ask him to do what he says he can do. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. COOPER].

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I am asking the indulgence of the House at this time for the purpose of raising my voice in support of this resolution.

I had prepared a resolution on this subject and was in the act of introducing it when I found that my colleague the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] had just introduced a resolution on the same subject. Naturally I withheld the resolution prepared by myself.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks and to include this brief resolution prepared by myself.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. BYRNS). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. COOPER]?

There was no objection.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, my resolution provided that a special committee of seven Members of the House of Representatives be appointed by the Speaker to investigate the various departments, bureaus, commissions, agencies, and activities of the Federal Government, with the view of reporting to the House of Representatives as soon as practicable and recommending such consolidations, changes, transfers, and eliminations as may be deemed wise, expedient, and to the public interest; and that said committee be authorized to call upon any and all departments and agencies of the Government for such information and assistance and for such clerical help as in the discretion of said committee may be necessary.

The centralization of power in the Federal Government, contrary to the fundamental principles of our Government, and the ever-increasing number of bureaus and commissions present question that is now challenging the thoughtful attention and consideration of Congress. In this Government, supposed to be a government by the people, we have more than 600,000 Federal employees and less than 600 of them are chosen or elected by the people. The number of these employees has increased some 68,000 during the last eight years and the cost of the Federal Government has increased about a billion dollars during the last decade.

At this time, when the matter of economy in Government is recognized on every hand as imperative, when we are bending every effort to balance the National Budget, I feel that the most important question in this connection is the matter presented by the pending resolution. In its far-reaching consequences to the matter of economy in our Government, I think this resolution is one of the most important measures considered at this session of Congress.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MCCLINTIC].

Mr. McCLINTIC of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I am heartily in accord with this program. I have felt for a long time that there was much duplication on the part of our Government departments. I know we can save a great deal of money if some of the departments are consolidated.

I have introduced a resolution which, if enacted into law, will allow a committee to be appointed for this purpose. I sincerely hope that legislation of this kind can be passed so that we can go ahead in the performance of our duty, thereby assuring to the taxpayers that we are looking after their welfare in the proper way.

I yield back the balance of my time, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. DOUGLAS].

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. Mr. Speaker, I was very much interested in the remarks of the distinguished gentleman from New York, the minority leader [Mr. SNELL], in which the gentleman referred the House to the language in line 16, page 2, of the resolution, and drew the conclusion that by reason of that language any recommendations of the so-called economy committee would, of necessity, be referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments.

In reply, may I call the attention of the gentleman from New York to the fact that the language reads as follows:

> Shall submit its recommendation of economies to be effected, and its recommendations, if any, on the organization of government, to the House of Representatives on or before the 15th day of April.

There are, therefore, two propositions. First, cuts in appropriations that can be made, and, secondly, consolidations of bureaus, abolishment of bureaus, or curtailment of activities of bureaus. It is not necessary to point out to the gentleman from New York that under the first category the Committee on Appropriations would receive the recommendations, nor is it necessary to point out that under the first category and under the power of the Committee on Appropriations, bureaus may be abolished or may be curtailed in their activities by the simple procedure of denying appropriations or curtailing appropriations.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. I yield.

Mr. SNELL. Then the gentleman does not intend to abolish, by law or by new legislation, or transfer these bureaus? The gentleman would just kill them off by defeating appropriations. Is that the purpose?

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. To curtail is one of the purposes. That remains to be seen.

Mr. SNELL. I supposed the committee would work out the whole scheme and combine the departments. If that is done it would necessarily have to be referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments.

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. The recommendation having to do with the consolidation of bureaus in the Government would be referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments for the necessary legislative action, but I call attention to the fact that there are two propositions—one requiring legislative action and one requiring appropriation action, one somewhat overlapping the other, but overlapping only in the cases in which legislation is necessary but not overlapping in the cases in which legislation is not necessary.

Mr. SNELL. Then, from the gentleman's standpoint, the Appropriations Committee at the present time, without additional authority, can cut those appropriations where that committee thinks it is proper to do so?

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. I am convinced that the Committee on Appropriations has so far done an excellent job in its reduction of appropriations, but I think that the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations will concede that even more can be cut off our annual appropriation bills.

The gentleman from New York and the gentleman from Indiana claim it would be infinitely preferable were there to be a joint committee appointed to accomplish the objects sought to be accomplished by the resolution now under consideration. I call the attention of the gentleman from New York and the attention of the Members of the House to the fact that, in so far as appropriations are concerned—and bear in mind that one of the objects to be accomplished by the resolution is the curtailment of appropriations—the power to originate is vested, under the Constitution, in the House of Representatives. Moreover, I call the attention of the House to the fact that if we attempt to accomplish the things sought to be accomplished by means of a joint resolution, undue delay necessarily follows.

This is no time for delay. This is a time in which speed is absolutely necessary—in which we must work with such rapidity that we will before this session of Congress adjourns have effected very substantial reductions in the cost of operating the Government. [Applause.]

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. FULBRIGHT].

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, I rise to voice my approval of the pending resolution. On February 1, of this year, I introduced a bill (H. R. 8690) providing for a survey commission to make a similar investigation, a commission to be composed of outstanding economists of the country with power to make a thorough and scientific investigation of the Federal Government with the view of eliminating useless boards, commissions, and bureaus and the consolidation of such governmental functions as might be found practical. It is stated by gentlemen on the minority side of the Chamber that the resolutions recently introduced and the one now pending are mere gestures and were proposed about the same time the President addressed his message to Congress. I desire to say that I introduced H. R. 8690 more than two weeks before the President's message was presented to the Congress and before he had exhibited any more than passing interest in such reform. As a matter of fact, it was stated on the floor of the House that several days before the President sent his message to Congress on this subject, February 17, dealing with reorganization of the Federal Government, he distributed copies to the newspapers of the country to be released at such time as he might transmit his message to the Congress. If this be true, I am wondering if it was intended more for political purposes than a real desire for economy and reform.

The bill I proposed recognizes the need for a careful and specialized study of the entire problem of reorganization, with special consideration of the functions, responsibilities, and activities of every establishment. It proposes to establish in the Bureau of Efficiency a survey board for the purpose of making a survey in order to determine what action should be taken to increase efficiency and reduce the costs of administration, with respect to (1) eliminating useless boards, bureaus, commissions, and other agencies; (2) merging or consolidating boards, bureaus, commissions, or other agencies whose functions are related, overlapping or duplicating; and (3) modernizing, systematizing, and standardizing the departments and agencies of the Federal Government.

This bill proposes that the Chief of the United States Bureau of Efficiency shall be a member and chairman ex officio of the survey board, consisting of five members, the other four members to be political economists of outstanding ability. The bill provides further that this board shall report the result of its survey to Congress within one year after the date the bill shall become a law. In this way its tenure will be limited and it will pass out of existence automatically.

The proposal that the Chief of the United States Bureau of Efficiency be chairman of the survey board seems to be logical and in the interest of economy because that is the only establishment of the Federal Government whose duties and functions for nearly 20 years have related to problems of organization and procedure. The bureau is an independent establishment purely of a service character whose work, and the knowledge already acquired by its specially trained force, will provide a most valuable source of information and assistance to the proposed survey board.

No survey of this kind has been made within the past 10 years, and it seems to me most essential that this great problem be approached in this way in order that the Congress may be in a position to proceed intelligently with the consideration of any bills which may be introduced to accomplish the reorganization of the executive departments of the Government.

It seems to me that this problem of reorganization is of such magnitude that it would be impracticable to consider in one bill the reorganization of the entire executive establishment. It will be most practicable to consider separate bills affecting similar functions; but without a survey and report, such as that proposed in my bill, our consideration of separate bills would be fraught with difficulty and lack of understanding, due to the absence of basic and necessary current information showing the nature and scope of the activities of each establishment and its peculiar functions.

I believe that careful and orderly procedure in approaching a subject of such magnitude as the reorganization of the administrative departments of the Government should be followed, but the pending resolution provides a method whereby effective action may be had with little delay. I therefore hope to see the resolution adopted and that as a result thereof a decided step may be taken in the elimination of useless boards, bureaus, and commissions, and in the consolidation of related, duplicating, and overlapping governmental functions, to the end that there may be a substantial saving to the taxpayers of this country in the administration of Government. [Applause.]

Mr. PURNELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MICHENER].

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, we are all agreed on one thing, and that is that we must have more economy in Government. It is just a question as to how we are going to proceed to bring about that result. I favor this resolution. I voted for it in the Rules Committee, and I am going to vote for it to-day. But, gentlemen, this resolution, if enacted into law—and mark my words—will be but a gesture. Why? Because there is but one way that we can effectuate economy, so far as consolidation in the departments is concerned, and that is by legislation. In order to legislate we must enact legislation in the House. It must then be enacted in the Senate. It must then be approved by the President.

We have to-day, as has been said, a committee set up for this specific work. We are now creating another committee to do the same kind of work. After that committee has considered the matter it reports to the legislative committee; then the legislative committee must go over the whole thing again and give the recommendations of the select committee its approval or disapproval. Then, assuming the legislation goes through the House, it goes to the Senate. After the legislation reaches the Senate the Senate must refer it to its legislative committee or a select committee. That committee must give consideration, and then after the two bodies have agreed, it must go to the President. Is there a man here so credulous as to believe there is not going to be investigation and consideration in the Senate?

If the House wants to pass something and lay it on the doorstep of the Senate and then go home and say, "We consolidated, but the Senate would not agree," that is one thing; but if we want to get results it seems to me the thing to do is to pursue the course which every intelligent and experienced legislator knows must be pursued if we are going to get results.

What is going to happen? The chairman of the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments, Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri, who appeared here, tells us that his committee is to-day considering these very things. We are going to delay the work of that committee. We are going to take the chairman and the ranking minority member from that committee and we are going to put them on a special committee and stop the work of the regular committee until when? Until April 15, 1932. Then their select committee is going to report back to the regular committee and then the matter will proceed in the usual way.

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MICHENER. For a question; yes.

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. If the resolution is as weak as the gentleman claims it to be, why does the gentleman say he is going to support it?

Mr. MICHENER. The gentleman is saying he will support it because he believes in economy and on its face this resolution appears to attempt to bring about economy, and the gentleman does not want to be misunderstood. In the Rules Committee I urged the very reasons I have given here. I stated to the Rules Committee that this was a mere gesture on the part of the House of Representatives, but that I was not going to place an obstacle in the way of anything that might point toward economy, even though I thought another method more certain of accomplishment.

We hear much talk about paring appropriations to the bone. The Committee on Appropriations has done splendid work and it has pared to the bone. But we must have something besides paring to the bone in these days. We must have some major economies; we must cut off some of these bureaus and some of these commissions; we must limit them in every particular where it can be done without absolute detriment to the Government at this time.

I am sure that so far as this side of the House is concerned and so far as every Member of the House is concerned, regardless of party affiliations, that is the feeling. I am going along with this thing to-day because it is the best thing we can get. In my judgment, this action on the part of the House will be about as effective as action of the House was on the so-called tariff bill. A short time ago the House enacted a piece of legislation which the country was led to believe would have some effect on the present tariff law. A new office was created, a new bureau set up, no rates were changed, and the word went to the country that the House of Representatives had speedily passed a tariff law. That legislation is still in the Senate, and, if I mistake not, will never see the statute books, at least in its present form. The announcement to the country that the Congress had passed a tariff law may deceive some people, but the results in the end will count.

The President can not consolidate the departments without authority of law, and if we were to give him that authority, inasmuch as this is an executive function, he could proceed according to directions, and it seems to me that the results could be much sooner obtained. However, if we do not want to part with the authority which the Congress has over these matters, then let those responsible in the House and who have within their power to have legislation reported from legislative committees call upon the Committee on Expenditures in the Departments to report out consolidation legislation now pending before the committee. I am sure that no trouble will be encountered in obtaining a rule, and the House can very shortly have before it something specific. If another committee is to be set up, it surely should be a joint committee. That is, if time is of the essence of this matter. I am sure that it is immaterial to the country at whose suggestion this legislation originates. It is curtailment of the expense of the Government that the taxpayers are interested in and not who is entitled to the credit for the enactment of such legislation. There has been a splendid spirit of cooperation in the House since convening, and let us hope that this spirit will continue, and let us all join hands in the most expeditious way in which this economy program may be put into effect. This resolution under the rule is not subject to amendment, and we must vote for it, without any changes, or vote against it, and for reasons above indicated I shall vote for it. [Applause.]

Mr. PURNELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAPES].

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this resolution is perfectly apparent. It is a mere make-believe. It is another gesture. Who can take it seriously?

The two major offensives of its own initiation of the Democratic organization in this House since its organization on the first of December have resulted in sham battles, pure and simple. One was the passage of the Democratic so-called tariff bill and the other is this resolution. In my judgment, this resolution will fall as flat, or flatter, if anything, than the so-called tariff bill has fallen.

The gentleman from Tennessee says that it is a Herculean task that this committee is going to be charged with. I will go further and say it is an impossible task. The committee is charged with the duty of investigating economies in the Federal Government which may be effected without impairing the necessary functions of government. Who thinks that any committee can make an intelligent investigation of that kind within six weeks? How can this committee determine within that time whether it is recommending economies that will impair the services of the Government or not? It is perfectly impossible. The committee will be obliged either to accept the work which others have heretofore done or to make an investigation of the most superficial character.

Furthermore, as suggested by my colleague the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MICHENER], the Committee on Appropriations is now making the appropriations for the next year. By the 15th of April practically all the appropriation bills will have passed the House. Will there be any possibility of further reducing the appropriations for the next fiscal year? Of course not. It is not the purpose of this resolution to bring about economy. It is only to make a bluff at it.

This resolution would place the duty of making this investigation, among others, upon the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, who for the next six weeks will have more work, with his regular committee work, than any one man can possibly do without having these additional duties put upon him.

The experience of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS], as he has given it here this morning, is some illustration of the obstacles that will be placed in the way of any recommendation of a substantial nature that a committee may make looking toward a reorganization of any of the executive departments. Any suggested changes will be fought by every interest affected. It will be absolutely impossible between the 15th of April and the close of this session of Congress to get any important bill through this body and the Senate to reorganize the executive departments so as to accomplish any substantial economies or any substantial savings or to prevent and eliminate waste and duplication in the Government service.

I say again, this resolution is a mere make-believe, it is a mere sham, and it can not be taken seriously by anyone.

Mr. BARBOUR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAPES. Yes.

Mr. BARBOUR. If this special committee is necessary, why could we not write into the resolution a provision that this special committee should report to the House, by bill or otherwise?

Mr. MAPES. Of course, that should be done if it was intended to accomplish anything real by the resolution. In my judgment, it is not expected that it will accomplish any substantial results. The House organization may be able to force something through the House of Representatives, but everybody knows that no measure of any importance on this subject can be put through the House and the Senate both before the adjournment of Congress unless it is started at once, and without waiting to act until after the 15th of April.

Mr. BARBOUR. If the committee had that power, then on April 15 the House could have something definite before it to act upon.

Mr. MAPES. Certainly; but the framers of this resolution, in my judgment, do not want the committee to have that power. It would be depriving the resolution of its make-believe character. That would be making it a real resolution. The committee would then be called upon to do something substantial. That would destroy the present purpose of the resolution.

To use the language of a distinguished Democratic Member of another body, if you desire to do anything further than to render lip service in this matter of governmental economy, then you should leave it in the hands of some one man to reorganize the executive departments; and, to quote further from that distinguished Democratic Senator, What one man is better equipped to do that than the President of the United States? [Applause.]

Mr. PURNELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA].

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, the deficit in our Treasury is not due to excessive appropriations but the falling off of expected or anticipated revenue. Naturally we must balance the Budget, but in so doing we must not destroy the efficiency of the Government. This question of economy is being made the handmaiden of every interest that is seeking to destroy Government supervision and Government control over their particular industry.

Let us be perfectly frank about it. Gentlemen who are going to be caught in this whirl of economy will rue the day. I believe in orderly parliamentary procedure, and the way to effect economy is to take each department separately and permit the legislative committee having jurisdiction over that department to give it study, consideration, and bring their definite recommendations to the House. There is great danger that under the spell for economy many useful departments of Government may come under unjust assault.

I can point out now the bureaus that may be the targets for this so-called economy.

1. The Bureau of Mines: Certainly, every big mining interest does not want any supervision of safety for their employees.

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. In just a moment.

Certainly, the large mining interests would prefer no publication by the Government bureau of statistics as to mineral resources.

2. The Pure Food Bureau of the Department of Agriculture: Certainly, every fake manufacturer, improperly labeling his commodities, does not want such jurisdiction and supervision. Many are the protests against this department, which was founded and established in the face of most obstinate opposition—by the interests which thrived on the sale of adulterated, impure, and misbranded foods and drugs.

3. The Bureau of Animal Industry: Surely the packers would indeed be happy to see it abolished. But recall Theodore Roosevelt's fight for this supervision, following the scandalous conditions exposed by Upton Sinclair in his book, the Jungle.

4. The Children's Bureau of the Department of Labor: Certainly every mill employer of children of tender years does not want the Children's Bureau on their backs all the time. They would be happy to see it abolished.

5. The Woman's Bureau in the Department of Labor seems to be objectionable to some—more about that another day.

6. The Federal Trade Commission would be the target of many on the ground of "economies," and certainly the Power Trust has been most active against this commission since the commission rendered such valuable public service in exposing the Power Trust.

7. The Board of Mediation and the Bureau of Labor Statistics would be other targets of the so-called economy. Why, there are people who strenuously object to the truth-telling data of the Bureau of Labor Statistics.

A great deal of this talk about balancing the Budget, where does it come from? From the very people who resent and who have been resenting proper governmental supervision or necessary governmental restraint of their improper activities. I know many of my colleagues are sincere in their efforts to reduce expenses. I only wish to caution them of insidious and selfish interests using their efforts to destroy many useful and necessary safeguards and protections which the sad experience of the past made necessary.

I am not going to be caught by a false cry of economy and be a party to any plan to eliminate many necessary Federal departments exercising jurisdiction for the protection of the people, and which bureaus it has taken years to create, and only after great battles by the people against entrenched and powerful interests.

Under this proposition there is great danger that legislation that has not been well thought out will be enacted.

I was talking with several Members, and it is clear to see that many Members who are shouting the loudest for economy have each some bureau that he wants to put out of commission. You will find that as we go on. Let anyone preaching economy take an appropriation bill and cut it further, but not begin to weaken the Federal Government at this time.

Mr. TILSON. The gentleman from New York would like to see one particular bureau weakened, would he not? [Laughter.]

Mr. LAGUARDIA. That can only be done by proper constitutional amendment or proper legislation.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Oh, I do not want to get into a discussion on prohibition. That is coming up later. Now, if I am not in favor of the resolution, I do not hesitate to express my opposition.

Mr. BLANTON. Is the gentleman in favor of leaving the question of reorganization and consolidation entirely to the President?

Mr. PURNELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOLADAY].

Mr. HOLADAY. Mr. Speaker, a few days ago Congress received a message from the President of the United States calling for economy. About the same time a movement on the Democratic side of the House was started as a gesture toward economy. On Friday, February 19, I introduced, without consulting anyone in the House or outside of it, House Joint Resolution No. 302, which if passed, will result in real economy.

I provide in that resolution that Congress give to the President the unusual power, I will admit, to abolish, combine, and consolidate any of the commissions, boards, bureaus, and departments of the Government, with a provision that he report back to the House the Executive orders which he may have issued to carry the economies into effect.

There was only one reservation, and that was a guaranty to the taxpayers of this country that there would be a reduction in the cost of Government. That resolution provides that where the President by Executive order had abolished, combined, or consolidated any of the agencies of the Government, as the result of that action, he must show a decrease of 20 per cent in personnel and 20 per cent in total cost.

That is the way to get real economy. You are not getting anywhere with this resolution.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. PURNELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all gentlemen who have spoken, or may speak, on the resolution have five legislative days within which to extend their remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, will not the gentleman make it all Members? I do not think that would be an imposition.

Mr. PURNELL. I would rather the gentleman submit that request separately.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members have five legislative days in which to extend their remarks in the RECORD on this subject.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. PURNELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HOCH].

Mr. HOCH. Mr. Speaker, I have time in one minute only to call attention to one matter to which reference has not been made. Lines 20 and 21, on page 2, read as follows:

That said Economy Committee shall have the authority to use as assistants employees of the Federal Government.

That language enforces the argument that this should be a joint committee and not merely a House committee. What power has the House alone to take the employees of the Federal Government, holding statutory positions, away from the work to which they are assigned and use them in the work of this committee? Obviously we have no such power. On the other hand, if this were a joint committee, we would have before us a joint resolution which has the full force of law. A joint resolution would give the power to take employees, in cases where thought wise, and assign them to the work of this committee. In the provision to which I have called attention attempt is made to do something which no House resolution passed by the House alone has power to make effective. I would like to have seen a committee clothed with full power to use Government employees in its work and every possible means of doing its work most effectively.

Mr. PURNELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield the remainder of my time of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHINDBLOM].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized for one minute.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Speaker, there is only one way in which any substantially large reduction in Federal expenditures can be made, and that is by the absolute elimination of many services and activities which have grown up during the years that have passed. Paring a few millions here and there will not do it. A major operation must be performed. Carving, not whittling, is necessary. The Federal Government is engaged to-day in activities which do not belong to the Federal Government, but which properly belong to the States and local authorities. Some of them are of the character mentioned by the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA]. We have, in addition, the system of giving aid to the States, taking money out of the Federal Treasury for the purpose of "matching" or supplementing some appropriation by the States for purely State purposes. The Government of the United States should return to the original purpose of being merely a Federal or central Government, and not of performing and duplicating all the functions of the State and local governments within the 48 sovereign States that compose the Union. When we do these things we can reach some measure of substantial reduction in expenditures. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, most of these activities and services are not, strictly speaking, of a governmental character. Many of them have been established under a broad interpretation of the "general-welfare" clause of the Constitution. They probably all serve excellent purposes. Most certainly they have been urged by large groups of citizens, who have succeeded in compelling Congress to yield to their demands. In many cases these services and activities were intended to stimulate the States in the performance of good works. The States in their turn, finding the Federal Government embarking upon some of their activities, have relinquished these fields, in the hope and to the end that the Federal Government may continue to perform functions which under our system of local self-government should have remained under the exclusive jurisdiction of the States and local communities. Even now, with the reduction of Federal income and the necessity of retrenchment in expenditures and of the imposition of new and additional taxes, we are being importuned to enlarge present functions and to undertake new responsibilities. The Congress must have the courage to withstand these pressures. Some of us know by not too pleasant experience that refusal to accede to these requests and to support appropriations in the interests of special groups will bring opposition and hostility, but in these times, which may truthfully be said to "try men's souls," we must devote ourselves to the greatest good for the greatest number. The situation that confronts us is above all financial and economic. Many useful and beneficial services must be abandoned or postponed until we have put our financial house in order. The Federal Budget must be balanced, expenditures must be held to a minimum, borrowing must cease, and revenues must be provided sufficient to cover the necessary cost, but only the necessary cost, of the maintenance of our Government and its institutions. In brief, Government must practice the same economy which the householder finds necessary when income has been lessened.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I yield seven minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD].

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, although the distinguished leaders on the Republican side say that they are in sympathy with this resolution, I have never heard a proposition raised here that was damned with so much faint praise by these gentlemen as this. The Democratic Party, by the confidence of the country, is in control of this House by a very meager majority. If I know anything about what the Democratic Party and its organization has in mind with reference to conducting the affairs of this country, it is that that party is resolved by all legitimate means, in the ultimate interest of the taxpayers of the country, to really cut down the national expenditures and try to cut out some of these unnecessary departments and bureaus. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAPES], who has lately assumed the attitude of chief apologist of the Executive for the failure in 10 years to do anything along this line, now rises in his place and asks the Congress of the United States why we do not lay this question at the doorstep of the Executive. It has been lying there at the doorstep of the Executive for three years and never has yet been carried into the interior of the White House. We propose, if we can do so, to take it off his doorstep and lay it on his table for action.

Mr. WILLIAMSON rose.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I decline to yield. It is confessedly the law of this country to-day that the President of the United States has the power, as was clearly pointed out by the distinguished gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] a few days ago, and he has had it during the three years that he has been in control of this Government, to consolidate these bureaus himself, to take the initiative in cutting out some of this duplication and overlapping and all that sort of thing. It is said that for 10 long years he has had a consistent record of recommending propositions of this sort. What the Democratic Party in this House has resolved to do, if we have the power to do it and the courage and the brain to do it, which I think we have, is to present something here that will force action upon the Executive of this country in undertaking to remedy this very distressed situation. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. GARBER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BANKHEAD. No. I have only a few minutes, and there are some matters which have been injected into this debate that I think ought to receive an answer. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAPES] says this is a mere gesture. What of all these long 10 years of protestation on the part of the President with reference to action along this line? How does the gentleman designate those maneuvers?

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BANKHEAD. No. With all of his power, with all of his opportunities, with all of his solemn convictions on this great remedial process, has he brought anything to the doorstep of Congress, because Congress must finally act upon this question? Has he come here with any definite, concrete proposition of economy and reform in the reorganization of our Government departments? If so, I ask you to point them out to me. Has anything been sponsored by any of the Republican leaders seeking to effectuate the gestures the President has been vainly making for 10 years?

I think I am speaking within the record. I want to say further with reference to what is going on in the family of the Executive himself there is undisputed evidence that at least four of his Cabinet within the last few days have left their desks in the Cabinet of the President and journeyed up to Capitol Hill to undertake to use their personal and official influence against propositions pending in the various committees of this House seeking real economy in public expenditures.

Moreover, as was read to the House by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN] a few moments ago, they are not only doing that but the Cabinet officers are sending out private communications to the great newspapers of the country, urging them to engage in an editorial crusade against the Congress of the United States, which is undertaking in good faith to bring about some real economy in the administration of the public affairs of the country.

Mr. MICHENER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Does the gentleman who now rises deny the accuracy of those statements which the gentleman from Missouri read? They are made upon the solemn responsibility of a great newspaper in the city of St. Louis. Does the gentleman apologize for it? Does the gentleman commend that sort of activity upon the part of Cabinet officers of the President when that President is sending word here urging Congress to practice economy?

Mr. MICHENER. In answer to the gentleman, may I ask the gentleman if he does not know that no Cabinet officer has appeared before any committee of this Congress unless invited by the committee, which is headed by a member of the Democratic Party?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Oh, yes; unless invited; but they have been there, whether they got there by invitation or by volunteering to come. What I am complaining about is that they are using their official and personal influence to try to destroy the efforts of the Congress of the United States, particularly the Democratic Party, to carry out some real reforms in economy.

Mr. BYRNS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I yield.

Mr. BYRNS. Three Cabinet officers have given interviews to the newspapers, attacking the Committee on Appropriations for reducing their estimates.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Exactly. I commend to the thoughtful consideration of your great President, for whom personally, of course, I hold great respect, that if he expects the Congress of the United States, on our side and on your side, in good faith, to undertake to carry out his recommendations, he should put his own house in order first and keep this official meddling away from Capitol Hill. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. All time has expired.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MICHENER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] referred to "your President." Is that proper language? Is he not the President of all the people of the United States?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think that is a proper parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the resolution to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the resolution as amended.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BLANTON) there were—ayes 215, noes 22.

So the resolution as amended was agreed to.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS—ECONOMY COMMITTEE

Mr. WILLIAMS of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, strict economy in all branches and departments of government, national, State, local, and municipal, is one of the urgent needs of the time. The financial condition of many of the large cities of the country is desperate. Scarcely a county or local government unit has funds sufficient to meet its current expenses. Many of the States are in financial straits and the National Government is facing a deficit of over $2,000,000,000. While local, State, and national income and expenditures have increased many times over during the last quarter century, the machinery of government remains essentially the same and has now become antiquated and broken down. It is a fact universally known and recognized that the affairs of government are not administered as efficiently and as economically as those of private enterprise. No great business or industrial organization could long survive bankruptcy attempting to carry on with the clumsy, cumbersome, confusing, and worn out, antique methods that are used in the conduct of public affairs. In our own State, Missouri, the income and expenditures are to-day over fourteen times what they were 30 years ago. While there has been an enormous increase in the expense of collecting and disbursing the revenues, there has been little change in the methods.

One of two things is evident, either those who are charged with responsibility for the management of governmental business have not the foresight and ability to set in operation a modern, highly efficient, a skillful, and an economical organization to carry on the public business, or those same persons having the ability have not the courage and determination to set up such an organization because of political pressure, temporary expediency, or absolute indifference to the welfare of the people. A man who has not the ability to set up such machinery should not occupy a place of responsibility. A man who has the ability and who fears to use it because of political expediency, or who is indifferent to the reckless expenditure of public funds, should acknowledge his unfitness for public office and resign at once.

In the Republican national platform of 1920 there is found the following:

> We advocate a thorough investigation of the present organization of the Federal departments and bureaus, with a view to securing consolidation, a more businesslike distribution of functions, the elimination of duplications, delays, and overlapping of work, and the establishment of an up-to-date and efficient administrative organization.

That sounds splendid. It reads fine; investigate, eliminate, consolidate, and make efficient. That is glorious. But what was done?

In the Republican national platform of 1924 one reads:

> We favor a comprehensive reorganization of the executive departments and bureaus along the lines of the plan recently submitted by a joint committee of the Congress which has the unqualified support of President Coolidge.

Here is a reorganization plan along a definite line. Notwithstanding that there was nothing of importance done. The leaders of this party were so well pleased with their elimination, consolidation, and efficient reorganization of the executive departments and bureaus that not a word was said on the subject in the platform upon which Mr. Hoover was elected in 1928. They contented themselves merely with the statement, "Economy has been raised to the dignity of a principle of government." In view of these platform promises and this bold declaration of economy, it is entirely fit and proper to look at the record.

In determining the actual operating cost of the Government many items of expenditure must be eliminated, the largest of which are payment of interest on our national debt and granting pensions to the veterans of the various wars and their dependents. Discarding everything except the actual operating expenses of the Government, what becomes of the claims made by our Republican friends that the bureaus and departments of the Government have been consolidated and efficiently and economically reorganized? It would hardly be fair to compare the expenses of some of the boards and departments for the years immediately following the war, because there were still at that time many war activities being carried on.

To begin with, the number of Federal employees increased 68,000 between 1920 and 1930. For the purpose of comparing the cost of Government the period from 1925 to 1930, inclusive, may be taken. The bare operating expenses of the 10 departments of Government, the Cabinet positions, increased during that period from $872,178,000 in 1925 to $1,116,050,000 in 1930, or 28 per cent. The mere running expenses of the various commissions, boards, and bureaus, independent administrative establishments, increased during that period from $69,879,000 to $124,891,000, or 79 per cent. Four years of Coolidge constructive economy and two years of Hoover smug complacency brought us a 79 per cent increase in the cost of bureaus and commissions.

The expenses of the executive branch of the Government, the salary of the President and Vice President, the expense for the travels and for the clerical force for the President and for maintaining the White House and grounds; in other words, the expenses of the office of President increased from 1925 to 1930 over 45 per cent.

Under this same efficient and economical management the total expenses of Government for the year 1931 were $602,833,000 greater than they were for 1926. This is economy with a vengeance. In 1925 the United States Government had a surplus of $402,632,000 in income over and above expenditures, while under the careful and extremely frugal direction of this and the preceding administration at the close of 1931 the excess of expenditures over receipts was $1,501,919,000, and this deficit is growing greater day by day. What excesses and extravagances have been engaged in under the name economy! This word has been used as a smoke screen to conceal the saturnalia of riotous and excessive expenditure of public funds.

During this same period the value of farm lands, farm products, and income from farm production materially decreased until at the present time they have almost reached the vanishing point. During this time the wholesale and retail commodity prices declined 25 or 30 per cent and since that time have gone much lower. At the present time, with our foreign commerce vanishing, with farm products selling much below the cost of production, and with farms being sold for taxes and interest, with our mines and factories shut down or working only half time with limited force, with banks and business enterprises by the thousands closing their doors in bankruptcy and failure, with the wages of those who are at work being reduced and taxes being increased, with 7,000,000 men out of employment, with hunger marchers making a pilgrimage to Washington to present their claims to the Government and to demand relief, with poverty, destitution, want, and suffering abroad in the land it does seem that the time is here to stop the lavish and riotous expenditure of money in the Nation's Capital. Following these large expenditures an unheard-of deficit in the Treasury has developed, and the Ways and Means Committee is now busy day and night striving to devise some plan to remove the deficit, and balance the Budget. This can only be done in the end by taxation. Thus we go around the unending and vicious circle—increased expenses and increased taxes.

It has been suggested that the salaries of the Representatives and Senators be cut as a start on the road to economy. That may not be a wise policy, but so far as I am concerned it may be done at once. However, that would be but as a grain of sand on the seashore in a real economy program. It may be interesting to know that if the entire legislative branch of Government could be wiped out, including both branches of Congress—435 Representatives and 96 Senators, all clerks and secretaries, as well as heating, lighting, maintaining, and operating the Capitol Building and Grounds—if by one stroke of the pen they could all be eliminated from the pay roll this hour, the expenditures of the Federal Government would be reduced only thirty-five one-hundredths, or a little over one-third of 1 per cent.

There is a Missourian holding the position of Secretary of Agriculture, a department which is supposed in some measure to assist, advise, and encourage the agricultural industry of the Nation. He has been devoting considerable time to the preparation and delivery of rabid, partisan speeches until at last he ran amuck, and now, somewhat to our chagrin, he has been dubbed "a turnip head" by the brilliant Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS]. As Secretary, he is ex officio member of the Farm Board, a creature of this administration and an organization that has been roundly condemned and thoroughly repudiated; a board whose half-baked and ill-advised policies have led to the wasteful and extravagant expenditure of money at the expense and to the detriment of the farmer. It is informative to learn that according to the statement of the United States Treasury of February 15, 1932, for the last six months of 1931, the Department of Agriculture alone cost the United States Government over

$248,370,000, almost a quarter of a billion dollars for six months and more than sixteen times as much as the entire legislative branch of the Government cost for the same period of time. This is economy "raised to the dignity of a principle."

It is said that we have the Department of Commerce housed in a stately building that cost the handsome sum of seventeen and one-half million dollars, and that at the cost of $190 per month there is maintained in that building a private elevator to shield that distinguished Secretary from the gaze of the public and the touch of the rabble.

We are now told that fine, expensive, beautiful, comparatively new and modern Government buildings must be torn down because their particular form of architecture is not in harmony with certain artistic designs and plans. There seems to be a mad, frenzied effort to see how lavishly and extensively money can be spent.

There is not a great business concern in this entire country from Maine to California and from the Lakes to the Gulf; no transportation system, no financial institution, no mine, mill, or factory, no wholesale or retail house, no industrial organization, no farm association, or activity that has not in recent months reduced its overhead and cut down its operating expenses. Out of all the agencies and activities of the entire country, it has remained for the United States Government alone to fail to put its house in order and reduce expenses; but, to the contrary, it has been the insistent, constant, and persistent policy of those in power to increase the cost of government.

An earnest effort is now being made by Congress to reduce the cost of government and reorganize the departments and bureaus on an economical and efficient basis. The appropriation bills already passed by the House have reduced appropriations below the Budget estimate about $60,000,000. There has been opposition to these reductions from different sources, but they have been made. A number of bills and resolutions have been introduced to consolidate bureaus and commissions, one by my distinguished colleague, Mr. FULBRIGHT, of Missouri.

A movement has been set on foot to consolidate the military and naval departments into one department, national defense. About 55 cents of each dollar of the operating cost of government goes for military services. In my opinion, it is necessary to provide reasonable and proper national defense, but it is evident that there can be an immense saving by a reorganization of these departments. Still, it is openly stated that Cabinet officers are busy using their high official positions and influence to prevent the consolidation.

House Resolution 151, introduced by the able Member from Arizona [Mr. DOUGLAS], provides for the appointment of a committee of seven Members of the House to investigate and submit recommendations as to economies in the Federal Government that may be effected without impairing the necessary functions of government. It further provides that the chairman of the Appropriations Committee, the brilliant, capable, and fearless gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS], and the chairman of the Committee on Expenditures in Executive Departments, the tireless worker, the skilled and efficient Member, my distinguished colleague [Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri], shall be members of this committee. With their intimate knowledge of governmental affairs, by their assistance and efforts and under their direction and leadership, it is confidently expected that a real reorganization program will be presented and that substantial economies will be effected.

It is said that suggestions for reorganization have been made by this administration. If so, they were heard in silence and not talked about above a whisper. What the country needs is a leadership that will speak in thunder tones that can be heard from coast to coast that there must be and there shall be a real, scientific, efficient reorganization of the agencies of the Government, and that there must be and there shall be real and substantial economies effected, not a pale, weak, milk-and-bread, mollusklike policy but one of iron and courage.

There is no longer any reason or excuse for these antiquated, inefficient, worn-out, lumbering, and costly agencies of government. The time has come to step out in front, burn the bridges behind us, set our hands to the plow, turn our faces toward the future, and, regardless of political jobs and musty precedents, set up the machinery of government upon an efficient and economical basis in the interest of the taxpayers of the country. To not do so is to acknowledge our inability or to confess our lack of courage.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, the House has fixed a limitation of two hours in the discussion of the prohibition item carried in the appropriation bill and all amendments thereto.

I now wish to ask unanimous consent that the two hours' time so fixed be divided equally between the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SHREVE] and myself, with the understanding that the gentleman from Pennsylvania will yield one-half of his time to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BECK] or such Members as he may suggest, and I will yield one-half of my time to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LINTHICUM] and such Members as he may suggest.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

There was no objection.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, there is one other controversial item in the appropriation bill. Following disposition of the item carrying the appropriation for prohibition enforcement, the committee will take up the item carrying an appropriation for the Employment Service in the Department of Labor. Interest has been expressed in that item. I therefore ask unanimous consent that debate on that item be limited to one hour, one-half of the time to be controlled by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. SHREVE, and one-half by myself, with the understanding that the gentleman from Pennsylvania will yield one-half of his time to those who are opposed to committee amendments, and I will also yield one-half of my time to those opposed to such amendments.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

There was no objection.

Mr. MAPES. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I yield.

Mr. MAPES. Does the gentleman propose to have the debate on the prohibition item immediately upon the House resolving itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, or does the gentleman propose to finish the reading of the bill first?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. The debate on the prohibition appropriation will be the first item to be taken up.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I yield.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Is it proposed to take a vote on the appropriation bill to-day?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Yes. I will state that it is the hope of the committee to finish the bill by 5.30.

DEPARTMENTS OF STATE, COMMERCE, JUSTICE, AND LABOR APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 9349) making appropriations for the Departments of State and Justice, and for the judiciary, and for the Departments of Commerce and Labor, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 9349, the State, Justice, Commerce, and Labor Departments appropriation bill, with Mr. MCREYNOLDS in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Salaries and expenses: For expenses to enforce and administer the applicable provisions of the national prohibition act, as amended and supplemented (U. S. C., title 27), and internal revenue laws, pursuant to the act of March 3, 1927 (U. S. C., Supp. V, title 5, secs. 281-281e), and the act of May 27, 1930 (46 Stat. 427), including the employment of executive officers, attorneys, agents, inspectors, investigators, supervisors, clerks, messengers, and other personnel in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, to be appointed as authorized by law; the securing of evidence of violations of the acts; the cost of chemical analysis made by other than employees of the United States and expenses incident to the giving of testimony in relation thereto; the purchase of stationery, supplies, equipment, mechanical devices, newspapers, periodicals, books, including law books and books of reference, and such other expenditures as may be necessary in the District of Columbia and the several field offices; costs incurred in the seizure, storage, and disposition of liquor and property seized under the national prohibition act, including seizures made under the internal revenue laws if a violation of the national prohibition act is involved and disposition is made under secton 3460, Revised Statutes (U. S. C., title 26, sec. 1193); costs incurred in the seizure, storage, and disposition of any vehicle and team or automobile, boat, air or water craft, or any other conveyance seized pursuant to section 26, Title II, of the national prohibition act, when the proceeds of sale are insufficient therefor or where there is no sale; purchase of passenger-carrying motor vehicles at a total cost of not to exceed $50,000, including the value of any vehicles exchanged, and the hire, maintenance, repair, and operation of motor-propelled or horse-drawn passenger-carrying vehicles for official use in field work; and for rental of quarters; in all, $11,369,500, of which amount not to exceed $370,120 may be expended for personal services in the District of Columbia.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Must we introduce the different amendments we want to introduce at this time or may they be introduced at any time during the discussion of two hours?

The CHAIRMAN. They can be offered at any time and read for information, but they should be disposed of after general debate is concluded.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment for information.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland offers an amendment for information, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LINTHICUM for information: On page 38, line 3, after the word "Columbia," insert "Provided, however, That no part of said appropriation shall be used for the expense of what is commonly known as wire tapping."

Mr. SHREVE. Mr. Chairman, in order to carry out the unanimous-consent agreement made a few minutes ago, I desire to yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BECK].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania will be recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. BECK. Mr. Chairman, under the privilege of allotting these 30 minutes, which we owe to the courtesy of the gentleman from Alabama, I yield 7 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TINKHAM].

Mr. TINKHAM. Mr. Chairman, as a member of the subcommittee of the Appropriations Committee which reported the appropriation bill now before the committee, I wish to bring to the attention of the committee the following interesting facts:

In other words, reductions were made in 83 items of the bill.

It will be noted that there was a reduction made for "enforcement of wireless communication laws," and a reduction also for enforcement of the immigration laws.

However, there is one bureau of one of these four departments which has not suffered the reduction of one cent from the Budget estimates, the Bureau of Prohibition, in the Department of Justice. The 1933 estimates for the Bureau of Prohibition were $11,369,500 and the committee recommends the appropriation of this amount, notwithstanding that for 1931 the bureau had an unexpended balance of more than $170,000.

The Bureau of Prohibition would seem to be the Government's sacred cow. Nothing must be deducted from the appropriation for this bureau; the sustenance of the sacred cow must not be curtailed in any particular. The protestations of the urgent need for economy are completely negatived in this direction.

Let us dissect this sacred cow. We find it employs 3,122 employees drawing salaries aggregating $7,956,804, including a director at $9,000, three administrators receiving $27,000, an assistant administrator at $7,500, and a head of a legal division at $7,000.

But this is not the worst that we have to report on the sacred cow. It calls for an appropriation of $160,000 for "stool pigeons," who are designated as "special employees," and $217,350 for "special and miscellaneous current expenses," which expenses constitute for the most part the purchase of liquor and incidental expenses, such as the purchase of meals, hotel charges, and the like. According to the department, in 1931, $134,342 were expended for the purchase of liquor and $46,223 for expenses incident to procuring evidence, such as lunches and meals, a total of $180,565.

These are unclean items. If the next Congress is controlled by those who are opposed to prohibition, pressure will be brought to bear to prevent the appropriation of any money for enforcement. To defend future appropriations of money it behooves this Congress to make as clean and economical a bill as possible.

I wish to draw particular attention to another item, a small item, to be sure, only $700, for "Emergency purchases of stationery and office supplies in the open market by field organizations performing undercover work," and to quote the denouncement of the circuit court of appeals for the Indianapolis district of the use made last year in that district of funds of a somewhat larger sum appropriated for the same purpose:

> We think there is a vast difference between the use of decoys for the purpose of detecting crimes and apprehending criminals and the use of decoys to induce others to join in unlawful conspiracy originated by the Government for the purpose of securing the violation of laws by others.
> It is unnecessary to the due administration of the criminal laws and it shocks the court's sense of justice to permit a prosecution to proceed where the evidence shows the offender was innocent of wrongdoing and free of evil intent prior to his acquaintance with the Government or State representatives who, in the professed cause of law enforcement, proceed, first, to corrupt the accused's mind by possibilities of profit and gain through violation of the statutes, and then, surrounded by accomplices as witnesses, await the downfall and ignominy of the victim.
> Although it [the Government] be a sovereign, it should not be permitted to adopt means which are condemned by the courts when practiced by its citizens.
> Such a situation is not dissimilar to the case where one arranges through a third party for a robbery to be committed upon himself with a view of receiving a reward, or a case of burglary, where the entry was made through the assent of those who were in the occupancy or control of the building burglarized.

I wish also to draw attention to the fact that unless a limitation is placed on wire tapping, any part of the appropriation for the Bureau of Prohibition may be used for this nefarious practice, denounced by a member of the Supreme Court of the United States as "dirty business." Let me add that the Department of Justice refused to inform the Appropriations Subcommittee how many wires had been tapped during the last fiscal year, notwithstanding the only information requested was the number of wires tapped, not a list of the cases or the districts or even the States in which the wire tapping occurred. For all the country knows, there may be thousands of wires tapped daily in the United States.

It is my intention to offer an amendment in the form of a limitation forbidding the expenditure of any appropriation for the Bureau of Prohibition for wire tapping.

Mr. Chairman, with unanimous consent, may I have the right to revise and extend my remarks?

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I yield seven minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, during the past two weeks the newspapers that have been subsidized by the liquor traffic have heralded that this was to be a field day for the wets. They have advised us in advance about how many different fights the gentleman from Massachusetts would wage against the appropriation for prohibition enforcement, and the many ways he would attempt to restrict and limit the appropriation.

And it has been broadcast that an assault would be made upon the enforcement appropriation led by the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BECK] on the Republican side of the aisle, and by the distinguished gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LINTHICUM] on the Democratic side.

And so portentious appeared the battle array that a unanimous agreement was reached in the House last week that the debate would not occur until to-day, and that two hours should be allotted for the discussion, one half to be used by the wets and the other half by the drys.

And the wets are here now in full force, with their banners streaming. But the main wet-or-dry test vote is not to come on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LINTHICUM] to stop wire tapping, because many drys will vote for that amendment, but the test vote, wet or dry, is to come on the amendment to be sponsored by our distinguished friend from New York [Mr. BOYLAN] to reduce the appropriation for prohibition enforcement, because no drys will vote for it and all wets will support it.

It has been contended here in running debate for several months that only churchmen who want to preach morality into men against their wishes are in favor of prohibition. It is likewise contended that prohibition crowds our penitentiaries. I want to quote from a famous agnostic who wrote what I quote long before we ever dreamed of national prohibition, who gives us a vivid picture of saloons and the liquor traffic—more vivid than words now will portray. It is from Col. Robert G. Ingersoll I now quote. I want you to note specially what he says about the liquor traffic—in preprohibition days—"filling jails" and "crowding penitentiaries." Here is what he said:

ROBERT G. INGERSOLL ON ALCOHOL

> I am aware that there is prejudice against any man engaged in the manufacture of alcohol. I believe that from the time it issues from the coiled and poisonous worm in the distillery until it empties into the hell of death, dishonor, and crime it demoralizes everything that touches it from its source to its end.
> I do not believe that anyone can contemplate the object without prejudice against the liquor crime. All we have to do, gentlemen, is to think of the wrecks on either banks of the stream of death, of the suicides, of the insanity, of the poverty, of the ignorance, of the destitution, at the little children tugging at the faded and withered breasts of weeping and despairing mothers, of the wives asking for bread, of the men of genius it has wrecked, and man struggling with imaginary serpents. I believe every thoughtful man is prejudiced against this damned stuff that is called alcohol!

Intemperance cuts down youth in its vigor, manhood in its strength, and age in its weakness. It breaks the father's heart, bereaves the doting mother, extinguishes natural affections, erases conjugal love, blots out filial attachments, blights parental hope, and brings down mourning age in sorrow to the grave. It produces weakness, not strength; sickness, not health; death, not life. It makes wives widows, children orphans, fathers fiends, and all of them paupers and beggars. It feeds rheumatism, nurses gout, invites cholera, imparts pestilence, and embraces consumption.

It covers the land with idleness, misery, and crime. It fills our jails, almshouses, and asylums. It engenders controversy, fosters quarrel, and cherishes riots. It crowds our penitentiaries and furnishes victims for the scaffold. It is the lifeblood of the gambler, the element of the burglar, the prop of the highwayman, and the support of the midnight incendiary.

It countenances the liar, respects the thief, esteems the blasphemer, it violates obligations, reverences fraud, and honors infamy. It defames benevolence, hates love, scorns virtue, slanders innocence.

It incites the father to butcher his helpless offspring, helps the husband to massacre his wife and the children to grind the parricidal ax. It burns up men, consumes women, detests life, curses God, and despises heaven. It suborns witnesses, nurses perjury, defiles the jury box, and stains the judicial ermine. It degrades the citizen, debases the legislature, dishonors the statesman, and disarms the patriot.

It brings shame, not honor; terror, not safety; despair, not hope; misery, not happiness—and with the malevolence of a fiend it calmly surveys its frightful desolation and, unsatiated with havoc, it poisons felicity, kills peace, ruins morals, blights confidence, slays reputations, and wipes out national honor—then curses the world and laughs at its ruin.

It does all that and more—it murders the soul. It is the sum of all villainies, the father of all crimes, the mother of abominations, the devil's best friend, and God's worst enemy.

It was not prohibition, Mr. Chairman, that filled the jails in the time Robert Ingersoll wrote the above. It was saloons and the liquor traffic. It was not prohibition that "crowded our penitentiaries and furnished victims for the scaffold" in Robert Ingersoll's time—long before prohibition. It was saloons and the infamous liquor traffic. Ingersoll said "it murders the soul." Ingersoll said "it is the sum of all villainies." Ingersoll said "it is the father of all crimes." Ingersoll said "it is the mother of abominations." Ingersoll said "it is the devil's best friend and God's worst enemy." And when Ingersoll said all that he was talking about saloons and the liquor traffic, and not about prohibition.

Now, Mr. Chairman, because I want to refer to certain recommendations made by the Wickersham Commission relative to the Congress furnishing adequate money to enforce prohibition, I want to remind the House of the first four conclusions agreed to by the Wickersham Commission. These four conclusions were signed by each and all of the members of the commission except Mr. Lemann. Here are the four conclusions they agreed to:

1. The commission is opposed to repeal of the eighteenth amendment.
2. The commission is opposed to the restoration in any manner of the legalized saloon.
3. The commission is opposed to the Federal or State Governments, as such, going into the liquor business.
4. The commission is opposed to the proposal to modify the national prohibition act so as to permit manufacture and sale of light wines and beer.

The above conclusions are signed by George W. Wickersham, chairman; Harry W. Anderson, Newton D. Baker, Ada L. Comstock, William I. Grubb, William S. Kenyon, Frank J. Loesch, Paul J. McCormick, Kenneth Mackintosh, and Roscoe Pound. Only Mr. Monte Lemann did not sign same.

From his separate statement signed by Mr. George W. Wickersham, chairman of the commission, I quote from page 284 the following:

The older generation very largely has forgotten, and the younger never knew, the evils of the saloon and the corroding influence upon politics, both local and national, of the organized liquor interests. But the tradition of that rottenness still lingers, even in the minds of the bitterest opponents of the prohibition law, subsantially all of whom assert that the licensed saloon must never again be restored.

From the separate statement signed by Mr. Roscoe Pound, I quote from page 281 the following:

Federal control of what had become a nation-wide traffic and abolition of the saloon are great steps forward which should be maintained.

From the separate statement signed by Mr. Paul J. McCormick, I quote from page 273 the following:

From the evidence before the commission I have reached the conclusion that the outstanding achievement of the eighteenth amendment has been the abolition of the legalized open saloon in the United States. Social and economic benefits to the people have resulted, and it is this proven gain in our social organization that has justified the experiment of national prohibition.

Then again on page 275 he says:

Absolute repeal is unwise. It would, in my opinion, reopen the saloon. This would be a backward step that I hope will never be taken by the United States. The open saloon is the greatest enemy of temperance and promotes corruption. These conditions should never be revived.

Take the report of Mr. Henry W. Anderson, which is the first one privately given. The following is a crumb of value in it:

The abolition in law of the commercialized liquor traffic and the licensed saloon operated entirely for private profit was the greatest step forward ever taken in America looking to the control of that traffic. The saloon is gone forever. It belongs as completely to the past as the institution of human slavery.

We must not lose what has been gained by the abolition of the saloon. The time has come when in the interest of our country we should lay aside theories and emotions, free our minds from the blinding influence of prejudice, and meet the problem as it exists. Forgetting those things which are behind, we must bring into action against existing failures the great reserve of American common sense. By this means we shall advance the cause of temperance and achieve an effective solution of the liquor problem.

We all knew how Ada L. Comstock would report when she was appointed. I quote from what she says the following:

As I still hope that Federal regulation of the liquor traffic may prove more effective than that of the States, I favor revision of the amendment rather than its repeal.

They are all against leaving it to the States except Mr. Newton D. Baker. Those of us who were here during the war, those of us who were compelled to override the veto of our own President, Mr. Wilson, in the passage of the Volstead law, knew how Mr. Newton D. Baker stood as one of the leading members of the Cabinet of Woodrow Wilson.

Let me read you an excerpt from the signed statement of W. I. Grubb:

Prohibition is conceded to have produced two great benefits, the abolition of the open saloon and the elimination of the liquor influence from politics.

Remission to the States would assure the return of the open saloon, at least in some of the States, and the return of the liquor interests to the politics of all of them. Revision of the amendment by vesting in Congress the exclusive control of the liquor business would make certain the return of the liquor influence in national politics and possibly the return of the open saloon in all of the States.

Those of us who served here when Judge Kenyon was a Member of the Senate all knew exactly how he stood on this and other questions. What additional information do we get from his report? None. But here is his crumb of value:

Many prohibition agents have lost their lives in attempting to perform their duties, concerning which little reference is made in the press.

Then again he says:

There was drinking in the colleges before prohibition. It is not clear how any system that might make liquor easier to procure would remedy that situation. * * * The abolition of the saloon has been a mighty movement for the betterment of the Nation. The saloon was in partnership with crime. It was the greatest aid in political corruption. It never did a good thing or omitted to do a bad one. Nothing good could be said of it, and it is notable that very few people advocate its return. The open saloon in this country is dead beyond any resurrection. People are prone to forget the picture of conditions before prohibition.

Speak-easies, so prevalent in large cities, are not entirely a product of prohibition. They existed prior thereto. Interesting is the following account from a Pittsburgh paper of November 15, 1900:

"At the meeting of the retail liquor dealers yesterday the statement was made that there are in Allegheny County 2,300 unlicensed dealers who sell liquor, in violation of the law, every day in the year, Sundays and election days included. This is a decidedly startling assertion, for while it is notorious that speakeasies exist and are to some extent tolerated by the authorities, there has been no visible reason to suppose that illicit traffic was being conducted on so large a scale. The district attorney of the county and the public-safety director of the city ought to be heard from on this head. If the law is being violated so extensively as the licensed dealers claim, it is manifest that there must be a wholesome neglect of duty in official quarters."

Senator Kenyon well quoted Miss Evangeline Booth, then commander in chief of the Salvation Army of the United States, as follows:

You can hush every other voice of national and individual entreaty and complaint! You may silence every other tongue—even those of mothers of destroyed sons and daughters, of wives of profligate husbands—but let the children speak! The little children, the wronged children, the crippled children, the abused children, the blind children, the imbecile children, the dead children. This army of little children! Let their weak voices, faint with oppression, cold and hungry, be heard! Let their little faces, pinched by want of gladness, be heeded! Let their challenge—though made by small forms, too mighty for estimate—be reckoned with. Let their writing upon the wall of the Nation—although traced by tiny fingers, as stupendous as eternity—be correctly interpreted and read, that the awful robbery of the lawful heritage of their little bodies, minds, and souls is laid at the brazen gates of alcohol!

The people of the United States get a crumb of value from the following excerpt which I quote from the signed statement of Mr. Frank J. Loesch, page 265, to wit:

Even if it were a possibility of accomplishment in the near future, it would be unwise to repeal the eighteenth amendment.

Such repeal would cause the instant return of the open saloon in all States not having state-wide prohibition.

The public opinion as voiced in the testimony before us appears to be unanimous against the return of the legalized saloon.

Let me now give you an excerpt from the signed statement of Mr. Kenneth Mackintosh, quoted from page 272:

The fact should not be overlooked that the eighteenth amendment has marked a long step forward.

Now, let me quote some excerpts from the separate report signed by Mr. Monte M. Lemann, from Louisiana, he being the only member of the Wickersham Commission who failed to sign the four conclusions already quoted. Here are excerpts from Mr. Lemann:

The machinery of enforcement may, in my judgment, without disproportionate expense, be made adequate to cope with the industrial alcohol and smuggling aspects of the enforcement problem.

I do not favor the theory of nullification, and so long as the eighteenth amendment is not repealed by constitutional methods it seems to me to be the duty of Congress to make reasonable efforts to enforce it. * * * The additions to the field forces and equipment which are set out in detail in the Dennison-Sawyer study appear to be a moderate proposal in this direction and would involve no seriously disproportionate expense for the effort at prohibition enforcement, as compared with moneys otherwise expended for governmental operation. I therefore concur in the recommendations that the number of prohibition agents, inspectors, storekeeper-gagers, warehousemen, investigators, and special agents should be increased as recommended—

And so forth.

I do not think that any improvement in enforcement of the eighteenth amendment would result from an amendment of the national prohibition act so as to permit the manufacture of so-called light wines and beer. If the liquor so manufactured were not intoxicating, it would not satisfy the taste of the great majority of those who are now drinking intoxicating liquors, and if it were intoxicating, it could not be permitted without violation of the Constitution.

Elsewhere in his signed statement Mr. Lemann says—quoted from page 259:

Without considering the validity of the objections and reasons thus stressed, as to which opinions will widely differ, it seems to me clear that they do not justify failure to observe the law.

He says—quoted from page 260:

I do not think that to substitute for the eighteenth amendment a provision leaving the matter to Congress is any solution. * * *

The suggestion that the matter be referred to Congress seems to me not to dispose of the problem or to make any substantial advance in its disposition. Moreover, this proposal would mean that the liquor question would play a large part every two years in the election of Congress, that a fixed national policy of dealing with it would never be assured, and that all the political influence of the liquor interests would be introduced actively into our national affairs. It is suggested that this would be preferable to having these interests active with each State legislature, but relegation of the matter to Congress would carry no assurance even of this accomplishment, since Congress doubtless would not undertake to force any State to be wet which desired to be dry—

And so forth.

I can not see how any of our "wet" friends can get much consolation from the findings of the Wickersham Commission. There is plenty of good prohibition doctrine in the excerpts I have quoted above from the individual findings of each member of the commission.

Mr. Chairman, from the time the Attorney General of the United States appeared before our committee on January 19 until the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TINKHAM] got through with him three days and a half thereafter there were many disappointments to our friend from Massachusetts. I want to say that the answer to every question he propounded during those three and a half days was a great disappointment to him.

Now, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TINKHAM], with our friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. BECK], who is the brains of the wets, and our friend from Maryland [Mr. LINTHICUM], who is ably managing his side of the wet question, have all from time to time quoted from the report of the Wickersham Commission.

The Wickersham Commission made recommendations to your President, who caused them to be appointed, that greater appropriations be made for the enforcement of the law; and in accordance with those recommendations, your Attorney General made requests for appropriations and your President's Budget denied them, and I shall show that that is one very valuable contribution the gentleman from Massachusetts made to these hearings of several hundred pages, because he brought that out himself.

If you will look on page 23 of the hearings, Mr. TINKHAM, in questioning the Attorney General, propounded these questions:

What was the amount asked from the Budget Bureau in excess of what the Budget Bureau allowed you for the Prohibition Unit?

Mr. MITCHELL. The sheet here shows that the department estimates for the Bureau of Prohibition were $13,635,415, and the Budget's allocation was $11,369,500.

Mr. TINKHAM. What was the difference in dollars between what you asked for and what you received?

Mr. MITCHELL. Two million two hundred and sixty-five thousand nine hundred and fifteen dollars.

The Attorney General showed that the reason he asked for this sum, which the Budget did not allow him, was following the recommendations of the Wickersham Commission.

Now, the President ought to back up his commission. When he has a commission appointed that costs the people $500,000, and they make recommendations, he ought to let his Budget uphold them in their recommendations. The President's Budget is the creature of the President, it is his Budget, it is to carry out his financial program. The Wickersham Commission was his commission, he appointed every member of it, and yet when the Attorney General, following the recommendations of that Wickersham Commission, asked for $13,635,415 the President's Budget cut them down and gave them only $11,369,500, and refused to give them $2,265,915.

Why did not my friend from Massachusetts tell the House that? Why did he not tell the House that the President's Budget has already cut the enforcement appropriation down by $2,265,915?

Mr. IGOE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I am sorry, but the gentleman got me into the newspapers so much the other day I want to keep out of them. [Laughter.]

I wish all of our friends would read these 150 pages that our friend from Massachusetts caused to go into these hearings.

I was surprised the other day on the floor when he admitted here that he is not a profound lawyer. I thought he was. He had a trial brief about this thick [indicating] before our committee. Some lawyer prepared it for him. I do not know who. I am constrained to believe it must have been "the brains of the wets" that put that into his hands. He sat there for three days and a half with that lawyer's brief, asking every kind of question that a wet lawyer could ask a semiwet Attorney General of the United States, trying to hamstring this enforcement bureau, and he could not budge him.

I take my hat off to the Attorney General of the United States. He is a splendid gentleman. He is an outstanding lawyer. He is a man who believes in upholding the law of his land when he takes an oath of office. I am for your Republican Attorney General of the United States. I am for Colonel Woodcock. Every question our friend from Massachusetts, ingeniously as he framed them, and he did frame them ingeniously—every question he asked, that Attorney General knocked the black out, and I never saw a man as disappointed in my life as was Mr. TINKHAM.

Mr. BOYLAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I am sorry I can not yield. I have just a few minutes.

If you will read these 150 pages here and read the questions he asked him and read the answers that Colonel Woodcock gave, and the answers of the Attorney General, you will see why our friend from Massachusetts had to confine his remarks to generalities here on the floor and not lodge any of them specifically against any part of the enforcement unit.

Why, his fight is over. His attacks have ceased. His mouth is closed. He has been hushed up by the Attorney General of the United States, and now he has to leave it to the ingenious former Solicitor General of the United States to handle the wet cause here on the floor.

Even as to wire tapping, the Attorney General showed the necessity of wire tapping sometimes to catch wet crooks. If you can get a warrant and go into a man's home and search every crevice of the castle where he lives, why can you not tap his wires, if it is necessary to catch a crook? If it is necessary to catch a crook, the kind of crooks that stand at the top of this liquor traffic, why can you not tap their wires if you can get a warrant and go into their homes? He showed him it was necessary sometimes to do this.

Why, you do not hear any more from Brother TINKHAM on that. You know, Brother TINKHAM will be voting dry inside of two more years. [Laughter.] If he will use three more days and a half asking questions of the Attorney General and Colonel Woodcock, their answers will convert him, as sure as he lives, and he will be the strongest advocate of prohibition we have on the floor. [Laughter.] And you watch the test wet and dry vote that is to come on the Boylan amendment. It will show how few wets there are here.

I wish I could make the Solicitor General that is going to handle the wet cause read all these hearings. I wish the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LINTHICUM] would read them. They are convincing. They are unanswerable.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LINTHICUM].

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR].

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to read a short editorial from the New York Herald Tribune.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman, I shall read an editorial from the New York Herald Tribune of February 16, 1932, because it expresses, I believe, the sentiments of the country much better than I could express them myself. It is headed "One Comfort in Paying Increased Taxes" and proceeds:

The House Appropriations Committee yesterday cut down the budget for the major activities of the State, Justice, Commerce, and Labor Departments. The committee, however, disregarded the request of the wets that it apply the economy rule to prohibition enforcement along with other Federal activities. It explained its course thus: "The majority of the committee felt that as this appropriation is for the enforcement of a law which presents unusual difficulties, at times, in its enforcement, the appropriation should not be reduced." (Don't you love that "at times"?) What a great comfort this is going to be to all of us in paying our heavily increased taxes to the Government next year! How delighted we are going to be in the remembrance that no matter how much our Army and Navy have been cut down, the holy band of prohibition agents is to go on with unreduced strength in its successful work of keeping every single drop of intoxicating liquor outside the borders of the United States.

We very well know that the political influence of the organized forces in behalf of prohibition, the McBrides and the Cannons, are still operating as threateningly as ever. They still intimidate the Committee on Appropriations, irrespective of the politics of the members of that committee, who still timidly cast their eyes heavenward and see the "sword of Damocles" hanging over them. After gazing on this "vision," they weaken in their avowal of inflexible economy in every department. They dare not fulfill their promises of "paring to the bone." Their political future is at stake. I understand that only one member of the subcommittee in charge of this bill for appropriations for the Departments of State, Justice, Commerce, and Labor had the temerity to suggest a reduction in the appropriation for prohibition enforcement.

I sincerely hope there will not be any vote on these collateral matters here to-day. We have only to wait until the 14th of March, when we shall ascertain where every Member in this House stands on the prohibition question.

As you have been advised, the Linthicum House Joint Resolution 208, which is identical with the Beck House Joint Resolution 209 and my Resolution 212 and similar resolutions introduced by many other Members, has been denied a favorable report by the Committee on the Judiciary. Those resolutions contain in their first five lines the identical language recommended by the entire 11 members of the Wickersham Commission—to restore to the States their fundamental right to deal with the liquor question, at the same time giving protection to those States which desire to retain prohibition.

On next Thursday, February 25, 1932, immediately after the Chaplain's prayer, there will be filed at the Clerk's desk in this House a petition to discharge the Committee on the Judiciary from further consideration of this joint resolution. Under the newly adopted discharge rule, as soon as 145 Members shall have signed that petition the same goes in the calendar, and on the second or fourth Monday of any month after the same shall have been on the calendar for seven days it may be called up for consideration.

It is therefore our plan and program to bring before this House on the 14th of March, 1932, the question of resubmission of the eighteenth amendment to the people of the country at conventions called in the States for that purpose.

A subcommittee of the two wet groups in the House, of which I have been acting as chairman, have drafted a "beer" bill to be introduced within a few days after its approval as to detail by both groups. If that bill be not favorably reported by the committee to which it shall be referred within 30 days, a petition to discharge that committee will also be promptly filed so that an early vote on a "beer" bill may be had at this first session of the Seventy-second Congress. We shall, therefore, have two votes at this session—first, a vote on resubmission of the eighteenth amendment, and after that a vote on a "beer" bill.

The proposed "beer" bill is as follows:

A bill to provide additional revenue, and for other purposes

Be it enacted, etc.—

SECTION 1. That in order to provide an additional and substantial source of revenue to defray the expenses of Government and to relieve other industries and subjects of taxation from existing and additional burdens there shall be levied and collected on all beer, lager beer, ale, porter, stout, and other malt, brewed and fermented beverages containing one-half of 1 per cent of alcohol by volume and not more than 2.75 per cent of alcohol by weight, which maximum percentage is hereby declared to be nonintoxicating in fact, brewed or manufactured and hereafter sold, or removed for consumption or sale within the United States by whatever name such beverages may be called, in lieu of the internal-revenue taxes now imposed thereon by law, a tax of 3 cents per pint, to be collected under the provisions of existing laws: Provided, That cereal beverages containing less than one-half of 1 per cent of alcohol by volume may be manufactured and sold free of tax under the existing provisions of the national prohibition act as amended.

SEC. 2. Such beer, lager beer, ale, porter, stout, and other malt, brewed and fermented beverages containing one-half of 1 per cent of alcohol by volume and not more than 2.75 per cent of alcohol by weight shall be sold only in bottles, which bottles shall be filled at the brewery or place of manufacture, and shall not be sold to be consumed on the premises or in the building where sold, except where sold with meals in a regularly established dining room of a hotel, restaurant, or a duly incorporated club with membership, paying annual dues of not less than $15 per year, and the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall have power to prescribe and enforce rules and regulations carrying this section into effect, together with all the provisions of chapter 6 of title 26 of the United States Code, as amended and supplemented, and any other provisions of said title 26 as applicable to malt, brewed, or fermented liquors or beverages, and all provisions of existing laws relative to the licensing, registering, filing of returns, and payment of tax by manufacturer, brewer, wholesalers, and retailers in brewed, malt, or fermented liquors, and their agents and employees, are made applicable hereto and shall be enforced by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, under proper rules and regulations. Every brewery shall be assigned a number by the collector of internal revenue, which number shall not be held at the same time by any other brewery in his district, nor thereafter be changed except for reasons approved by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, and such number, one-half inch in size, shall appear on the label of each bottle. No license shall be granted or continued hereunder to any person who has been convicted of a felony under the laws of the United States or the laws of any State or Territory, and the collector of internal revenue shall revoke any license held by a person who shall continue to employ any person after knowledge that such person has been convicted of a felony under the laws of the United States or the laws of any State or Territory.

SEC. 3. No license shall be issued, granted, or continued by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue to any brewer, manufacturer, wholesale or retail dealer, or other person to make, distribute, or sell such beer, lager beer, ale, porter, stout, or other malt, brewed, and fermented beverages containing one-half of 1 per cent of alcohol by volume and not more than 2.75 per cent of alcohol by weight, in any State or Territory in which the laws of such State or Territory prohibit the manufacture, transportation, sale, or use of such beverages, or in any political subdivision thereof wherever, under constitutional provision or law granting local option, such political subdivision has duly prohibited the manufacture, transportation, sale, or use of such beverages.

SEC. 4. The national prohibition act, as amended and supplemented, is hereby amended by striking out the words "and is otherwise denominated than as beer, ale, or porter" in subdivision (1) of section 1 of Title II of that act, and no provision of that act shall apply to beer, lager beer, ale, porter, stout, or other malt, brewed, and fermented beverages containing not more than 2.75 per cent of alcohol by weight.

SEC. 5. Nothing herein contained shall be construed to authorize the shipment, transportation, or importation of such beverages into the United States from any other country or place, nor into any State or Territory or political subdivision thereof, whenever the manufacture, sale, transportation, or use of such beverages is prohibited by the constitution or laws of such State, Territory, or political subdivision, and such shipment, transportation, and importation is hereby expressly prohibited, and all existing laws applicable thereto and in force on the date of the approval of the national prohibition act are hereby declared to be in full force and effect.

SEC. 6. (a) No grain or other ingredients suitable for use in the manufacture of beer, lager beer, ale, or porter, stout, or other brewed, malt, or fermented beverages may be imported into the United States or any place subject to the jurisdiction thereof, or withdrawn from bonded warehouse for domestic consumption, if it is to be used in the manufacture of beer, lager beer, ale, porter, stout, or other brewed, malt, or fermented beverages.

(b) This section shall be enforced as part of the customs laws, and the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to prescribe such rules and regulations as may be necessary for such enforcement.

SEC. 7. Any offense in violation of, or any right, obligation, or penalty, or any seizure or forfeiture, based upon any provisions of the national prohibition act, as amended and supplemented, or upon any regulation or permit issued thereunder, committed, accruing, or incurred, respectively, prior to the time this act takes effect, may be prosecuted or enforced in the same manner and with the same effect as if this act had not been passed.

SEC. 8. If any provision of this act or the application thereof to any person or circumstance be held invalid, the validity of the remainder of this act and of the application of such provisions as to other persons and circumstances shall not be affected thereby.

SEC. 9. This act shall take effect on the thirtieth day after its approval.

A careful reading of this proposal will disclose that its main purpose is to raise revenue in these days of a national deficit of $2,000,000,000; to relieve industry and business, already overburdened with taxation, from additional burdens. The latest proposal of some of the leaders of the House is to enact a tax on "manufactures," an evasive phrase meaning a sales tax. What that obnoxious tax will raise no one dares even estimate. There is no machinery for its enforcement and no past experience as to its possible yield. From exact statistics, based on past experience, it can be safely estimated that a tax of 3 cents per pint on beer will yield five hundred millions of revenue per year to the National Government, with many times additional revenue to the States and localities which sorely need additional sources of revenue.

Take your choice, Mr. Manufacturer and Mrs. Consumer, between a "sales tax" and a "beer tax," each raising the same amount of revenue.

It will be noticed that the proposed "beer" bill permits the sale of beer containing 2.75 per cent of alcohol by weight. In the cases before the Supreme Court of the United States and in lengthy hearings before the Committee on the Judiciary of the House this percentage has been found to be nonintoxicating in fact and not in violation of the eighteenth amendment.

The bill also restricts the sale of the beer to bottles, and thus abolishes the saloon. Saloons are only necessary or possible where the beer is sold in kegs or barrels, with the accompanying necessary bar and apparatus for drawing the beer. No saloon could exist selling beer in bottles.

It will also be noticed that the bill prohibits the sale of the beer to be drunk on the premises except with meals in dining rooms of hotels, restaurants, or legitimate clubs. No convict can obtain a license to sell the beer or keep a convict in his employ. This provision disposes of the gangster and the racketeer.

The bill not only protects the dry State against the invasion of the beer against its laws but also protects the local community which has gone dry by local option from the sale of the beer within its confines. What more could any true believer of States' rights, local option, or temperance ask?

The bill also expressly prohibits the importation of beer into the United States. But what is probably one of the outstanding features of the bill is contained in section 6, wherein the importation of grains or other ingredients for the making of beer is expressly prohibited. This provision should especially appeal to the agricultural sections of our country, so sorely tried—yes, ruined—by a surplus of grain. It is estimated that 150,000,000 bushels of barley and corn will be used each year in the manufacture of this beer. Surely this use of purely domestic cereals will help to reduce our surplus and restore a fair commodity price to our farmers. Can anyone say this program is not worth while?

A copy of this bill has been sent to each Member of the House. The committee invites the comment of every Member.

The people of the country will then know exactly how many Representatives in Congress are in favor of resubmitting the question to the people, how many Members are still dry, and how many Members favor modification or repeal. There will be no dodging the issue. A dry Member may well sign the petition, because his signing merely means he is willing that the House consider the question of resubmission, but no wet Member can refuse to sign the petition and still pose as a champion of repeal or modification. By refusing to sign he or she forever is branded as a dry, unwilling that the people voice their sentiments on this greatest of all national issues.

Resubmission of the eighteenth amendment to the people is a new question in this House. Of 435 Members, there are in the House only 81 men who voted for or against the submission of the eighteenth amendment. There are now in this House only 60 men who voted to submit the eighteenth amendment and 21 who voted against its submission. There are, therefore, 350 men in the House who have never had an opportunity to vote on the eighteenth amendment.

The editorial which I read at the beginning of my remarks brings to my mind that old slogan of the dry fanatics, "If necessary, call out the Army and the Navy and the marines to enforce prohibition." Times have not changed nor the fervor of the drys. But now the slogan is "We shall spend countless millions in attempt to enforce this noble and unenforceable experiment, though we bankrupt the United States." [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. BECK. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. FINLEY].

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Chairman, criticism has been leveled at the Committee on Appropriations because the bill they framed, and which is now under consideration, while proposing to reduce appropriations for this, that, and the other purpose, does not propose to reduce the appropriation for the Prohibition Enforcement Service.

That criticism was to be expected, of course, from a small group of professional wet propagandists who happen to be Members of this House at this time, and was discounted in advance.

In order to assuage the indignation of these duly appointed critics of everything and everybody that will not bow down to the liquor traffic, let me suggest that the committee might have had a reason for what they did.

For instance, perhaps the committee believed that there are 35 or 40 organizations in this country, financed by profligate, predatory, and sinister wealth, whose sole and common purpose is to obstruct and prevent enforcement of the prohibition laws, and whose spokesmen and propagandists, both outside this Chamber and on this floor, incite, encourage, and foment violation and nullification of those laws. And who shall say there are not grounds for that belief?

Perhaps the members of the committee, as loyal Americans, felt that the suppression of such a conspiracy and the enforcement of our laws—all our laws—is a duty they owe to their country.

And if that was their reason, what law-abiding, patriotic American citizen will criticize them, either outside this Chamber or in it?

The fathers of some members of that committee fought under the Stars and Bars; of others, under the Stars and Stripes. Those fathers never surrendered to an inferior force. And they never declined the gage of battle when tendered by the other side.

Perhaps the members of the committee felt that they would prove themselves ignoble sons of worthy sires should they surrender to or retreat before a band of bushwhackers and freebooters, which carries no flag, acknowledges no allegiance anywhere, and whose sole object is rapine and plunder.

And if that was their reason what self-respecting son of an honored sire will criticize them, either outside this Chamber or in it?

Perhaps the members of that committee knew that the organized liquor traffic has no bowels of compassion and never had the semblance of a soul. Perhaps they knew that liquor has dug more human graves than war, pestilence, or famine. Perhaps they knew that it has destroyed more property than earthquake, fire, flood, or storm. Perhaps they knew that it has quenched more genius, clouded more intellects, and blasted more careers than all of human maladies. Perhaps they knew that it has built more scaffolds, peopled more prisons, almshouses, and insane asylums, blighted more lives, broken more hearts, destroyed more homes, and caused more crime, misery, degradation, poverty, and shame to the human family than all other agencies of the devil combined. Perhaps they believed that while the abhorred communists across the sea would drag God from the heavens the advocates and emissaries of the liquor traffic would, if permitted, enthrone Satan and establish hell on earth.

Perhaps the committee knew or believed those things, and believed that the Nation's money could not be spent to nobler purpose than to destroy the Nation's deadliest foe and this grisliest enemy of God and man.

And if they did, where is the God-fearing, country-loving American citizen who will criticize them either here or elsewhere?

Perhaps the memory of some members of the committee, like the wild bee to its hive, winged its way back across the void of intervening years to the childhood home and the mother, who, when her day's work was done, taught him to kneel at her knee and lisp that prayer which has bent a shield around the hearts of ten thousand times ten thousand boys during all the after years—that prayer which maybe some Congressmen still humbly and sincerely offer: "Our Father who art in heaven, hallowed be Thy name; Thy kingdom come; Thy will be done on earth as it is in heaven."

Perhaps the members of the committee felt that no man can offer that prayer, claim Almighty God as his father, acknowledge all men as his brethren, then temporize or compromise with the most monstrous enemy of both God and man without proving himself such a hypocrite as should be pilloried to the scorn and execration of all mankind.

And if they did so feel, shall the flickering, forked tongue of venomous criticism be darted at them by those destitute of like ideals and impulses? [Applause.]

Mr. BECK. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself eight minutes. I shall not accept the invitation of my distinguished friend from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] to read the hearings before the committee, which he thinks would convince me of the beneficence of wire tapping, because I am not fond of light literature. Moreover, even the authority of the Attorney General of the United States, for whom I have very great respect, would not reconcile me to anything so un-American and invidious as wire tapping, especially as I have a greater authority than even the present incumbent of that high office.

Justice Holmes, that venerable Justice of the Supreme Court, whose retirement from the bench a few months ago the Nation deeply regretted, probably the most philosophic of the Justices of that great tribunal in our generation, with his characteristic terseness of expression summed up the question in two words when he said that wire tapping was "dirty business." You can not add anything to that expression of Justice Holmes. Nor shall I discuss the remarkable fact that with the Government in a very grave fiscal crisis and when a sincere attempt is being made to reduce Government expenditures in every direction the only appropriation that seems to be sacrosanct, and upon which the hand of economy can not possibly be laid is the appropriation for the systematic manufacture of self-respecting Americans into criminals. I was surprised last Saturday when my genial friend from Alabama [Mr. OLIVER], not, I am sure, expressing his own choice of arguments but acting as the spokesman of the Prohibition Unit of the Department of Justice, sought to audit in dollars and cents the alleged benefits of prohibition enforcement. He quoted the Prohibition Unit as claiming that such enforcement had netted this Government $4,000,000 in the Treasury in dollars and cents, and that if one were to count the property that has been seized and destroyed the balance of trade in favor of the Prohibition Unit would be about $11,000,000 annually. I have no taste or desire to question the accuracy of the audit, although if I were more of a mathematician I might suggest, as the Attorney General himself admitted, that one-half of all the expenses of the Department of Justice goes to enforce this unenforceable law, and that, therefore, it might be fair to bring into the calculation one-half of the overhead of the department, which would make the balance of trade decidedly against prohibition enforcement.

But, Mr. Chairman, this question rises much higher than mere dollars and cents, and it is to demean a great controversy when we reduce it to the question of whether the appropriation for prohibition results in a return to the Public Treasury of a few millions of dollars. There is a great human element in this question that I wish I had time impressively to bring to the attention of this House. You must include in your audit the cheapened manhood of the people. Never does a policeman's hand rest upon a man that that man, however excellent he might have been in other ways, does not lose a little of his self-respect; never is a man arraigned in a criminal court, and is obliged to plead not guilty, even if subsequently acquitted, that some measure of his proud self-respect as an American citizen has not been lost; and never is a man convicted and sent to prison that his self-respect does not suffer a fatal impairment. In the 12 years of prohibition, how many American citizens have thus had their manhood cheapened? I can not tell you the exact figures, but it must be considerably in excess of 500,000 American citizens. At the present rate of grist of the Federal criminal courts over 60,000 men and women, and in some cases young boys, annually feel the hand of the law upon their shoulders and have been arraigned in the criminal courts in the vain attempt to enforce an unenforceable law. I spoke yesterday from the east portico of the plaza, and I imagine that in front of me were possibly at the most about 50,000 people. You would have to take that vast audience and magnify it tenfold before you could visualize this ghastly destruction of the self-respect of many Americans who have been indicted in the attempted enforcement of this iniquitous and foolish law.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BECK. Yes.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I will yield the gentleman one minute while I call his attention to what I have in mind. The gentleman referred to my statement in reply to questions asked, and I shall read what I stated in the hearings, which will be found on page 207, in respect to the matter of which the gentleman spoke:

Mr. OLIVER. I do not think we should put law enforcement on the basis of whether the bureau charged with the law enforcement is self-sustaining or not.

May I add that I share the views expressed by Colonel Woodcock, that it would be a great mistake to determine whether you shall enforce the law by the returns that flow from the enforcement of the law, in the way of money paid into the Treasury. If a law is to continue on the statute books, it should be enforced, as far as we can enforce it, within the limits of the appropriations that Congress grants.

Mr. BECK. I am very glad to hear the statement of the gentleman. It is worthy of him.

Mr. BECK. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself two additional minutes.

I am sorry I did not get far enough to outline what I believe will be the program of the wets without respect to party affiliations. We realize that a majority of this House has not yet seen the light. They will see it. Many of them are already well on the road to Damascus [applause], and before very long, certainly after the next presidential election, many a dry Saul will become a very devout and wet Paul, in my judgment. [Laughter and applause.] Therefore the final solution of this problem may only come in another Congress, and all we can do now is to indicate the grounds and the reasons for what will be the redemption of this Nation from an intolerable system of moral bondage.

When I was speaking from the east portico of the Capitol on the subject of Washington, I could not but recall the fact that the great architect of the Capitol, Latrobe, in his delightful autobiography, tells us that he dined at Mount Vernon, and that at the dinner he noticed that when General Washington had taken a glass of wine some of his taciturnity passed away and he became more genial. If Latrobe had said to him, "Now, General, I am something of a prophet. I see that you drink wine, and I see beyond your home are the fields in which you grow the grain from which you brew beer and the vineyards from which you distill the very wine you are drinking. I am a prophet. The time is coming, and it will come in a little more than a century, when the American people in a moment of aberration, which to another generation will seem amazing, will make it a crime to even possess a glass of Madeira or to brew beer or to distill the genial fruits of the grape." If Latrobe had said that, the old general would never have believed him, because it would have been inconceivable to Washington or Franklin or any of the founders of this Republic that any such intolerable system of moral bondage as the eighteenth amendment could ever become the fundamental law of the American people.

Mr. SHREVE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. KETCHAM].

Mr. KETCHAM. Mr. Chairman, the course of the discussion this afternoon has taken a different turn than most of us had expected. I had anticipated a general field day on this whole prohibition question. In fact, so certain was I of the turn that I expected the debate would take that I extended an invitation to a number of our educational friends to hear our distinguished friends upon the other side of this question present some of their arguments.

As you know, there are within the boundaries of the city of Washington at this time a splendid group of our citizens who make up a division of the National Educational Association. I refer to the annual meeting of the superintendents of that great organization. Newspaper accounts relate the fact that there are something like 15,000 of those splendid men and women now guests of the Capital City.

If any of them were on the Plaza yesterday afternoon and had the opportunity to hear that matchless address of our distinguished colleague, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BECK], and then, perchance, if they have been within this Chamber this afternoon and have listened to the remarks the gentleman has just made, I regret the striking contrast they surely note between the sublime eloquence of yesterday afternoon and the sorry exhibition before us just a few minutes ago. [Applause.]

My recollection is that one year ago, upon Washington's Birthday, we were likewise privileged to hear from this same colleague one of the most eloquent addresses upon the Father of our Country to which I have ever been privileged to listen. I declare to you that I would go a great many miles to hear him on that theme, and whatever might have been the number of times I had previously had the pleasure of listening to him, I would travel the distance gladly and be dead sure I would be amply rewarded for the sacrifice of time and money I had made. Then, as to-day, within a few hours after he had moved us deeply by his eloquent tribute to Washington and his references to the Constitution, he stood in this same public forum, forgetting the incongruity of it all, and sought by innuendo if not by direct attack to discount and belittle a part of the great document which he always loves to defend with that matchless eloquence of his. In the wide range of his study on Washington I wonder if he ever chanced upon this striking statement of the Father of our Country bearing directly upon the proposition now under discussion, namely, adequate enforcement of law:

Respect for its authority, compliance with its laws, acquiescence in its measures, are duties enjoined by the fundamental maxims of true liberty. The basis of our political system is the right of the people to make and to alter their constitutions and government. But the constitution which at any time exists, until changed by an explicit and authentic act of the whole people, is sacredly obligatory upon all. The very idea of the power and the right of the people to establish government, presupposes the duty of every individual to obey the established government.

Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, bearing in mind the lofty sentiments just quoted from the Father of our Country, it seems clear to me that the real test of patriotism at the present moment, and in connection with the particular item under consideration, is not the use of eloquent words but the performance of sworn duty. In the vote we are about to cast we are to reflect not only our personal views but are charged with the responsibility of expressing in addition thereto the voice of the thousands of people whom we are representing, and in a still larger sense the thought of the people of the whole United States. In that connection it seems timely to me to set out the oath of office taken by every Member of the House of Representatives:

I * * * do solemnly swear (or affirm) that I will support and defend the Constitution of the United States against all enemies, foreign and domestic; that I will bear true faith and allegiance to the same; that I take this obligation freely, without any mental reservation or purpose of evasion, and that I will well and faithfully discharge the duties of the office on which I am about to enter. So help me God.

In my opinion, Mr. Chairman, the situation now before us involves far more than the sum of money involved in the appropriation. It goes to the very fundamentals of the Government itself. Speaking as one member of the committee, I believe it to be my duty to support the request of the administrative officer directly responsible for law enforcement for the amount carried for this item, and likewise to support the very capable subcommittee which favorably reported the item after the most complete hearings referred to earlier in the debate. In this connection it seems to me there is a special obligation resting upon the membership of this House who are attorneys, and, therefore, in a larger sense accountable for proper enforcement of the law.

I have just been advised that the action to be taken by the opponents of the proposition under discussion is not to be directed to the whole appropriation but to one single item, and for this concession I am glad to commend them. However, I regret exceedingly that men of the very high legal standing of those thus far appearing in opposition, should stand upon the floor and by their attacks upon one single item, make more difficult the discharge of enforcement responsibilities. To me such action is a strange response to the solemn oath of office taken by all Members before the Speaker of the House on the opening day of Congress.

In another respect the position assumed seems entirely contradictory. Upon every occasion, when discussion upon this question occurs in this chamber, repeated references are made to lack of enforcement of the law, and bitter complaints are registered by the very people who by their utterances as well as by their votes, are seeking to make enforcement more difficult. It is my opinion that if one-half the energy and one-half the eloquence devoted to opposition to the law and its proper enforcement, had been placed squarely behind the law, long before this time we would have had a satisfactory standard by which we might judge results. I regret exceedingly that one of my colleagues has referred to it as an "unenforceable law" and another as an "iniquitous law."

Before my time expires I want to refer again to the splendid group of men and women who are guests of the Capital City as members of the department of superintendents of the National Education Association. If a referendum were desired from the whole country upon this enforcement proposition, I wish we might have, as indeed I hope we will have before the week is over, an expression of opinion from this splendid army of men and women in direct charge of the training of the boys and girls of the land. [Applause.] If we could have such a referendum from these men and women who are in such vital touch with the real problem, not only in its particular relationship to the young men and women of the land but also as it relates to their particular communities, I would be willing to rest the whole case upon the outcome of such an expression of views. I desire to congratulate them upon the fine leadership they have shown in this particular matter and the splendid spirit of patriotism they have always manifested in teaching the youth of the land proper reverence for the Constitution and sincere respect for all laws.

In conclusion, as one member of the committee, I want to accept cheerfully the challenge implied in the remarks of my friend, the gentleman from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR], who seems to believe there are some who hesitate to meet the issue which he assures us will be presented on March 14.

So far as I am concerned it will not be necessary to postpone the vote that long, nor to resort to the procedure indicated to secure an expression of my opinion. Indeed, I would have been glad if we could have finally disposed of the matter before this time so that the attention of Members might be given to legislative propositions of far greater significance and importance. I welcome the opportunity which is to come to us on March 14 through the resolution suggested by the gentleman from New York. [Applause.]

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, I yield four minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. BOYLAN].

Mr. BOYLAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I would like to have read now for information.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BOYLAN: Page 38, line 1, after the word "all," strike out "$11,369,500" and insert "$8,369,500."

Mr. BOYLAN. Mr. Chairman, in these days when we are trying to exercise every possible means of economy, there is no reason, to my mind, why we should not exercise economy in the Prohibition Department.

During the preliminary debate last week I asked the question what departments in this bill had not been reduced in their appropriations, and I was told there were only three departments, the Prohibition Department and two other departments. I brought out the fact that these three departments are engaged in the very laudable (?) business of sending people to jail.

I would now suggest as a new slogan for the prohibition forces represented here and elsewhere a slogan as follows: "We hereby pledge ourselves to the construction of better and handsomer and more commodious jails."

The Attorney General stated in the hearings that of his large appropriations of $55,000,000, between 50 per cent and 60 per cent of the total amount is to be spent for the enforcement of prohibition. This being the case, why should not prohibition take a cut in this era and age of economy together with every other department of Government? Is it, as the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania has said, sacrosanct? Is it above and beyond the law? Is it on a pedestal by itself, that we should exclude it from all the departments in which an effort is being made to make a saving in this hour of need?

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TINKHAM] at the hearings brought out the fact that there were 13 civilians killed during the year 1931 as against 9 prohibition officers, and the distinguished gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] said:

That would indicate that the bootleggers are better shots than our prohibition agents. I would suggest to Colonel Woodcock that he have them trained a little bit in the use of firearms. Whenever they go after a man they ought to arrest him. If it requires killing him, they ought to kill him, in my judgment.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the distinguished gentleman from New York yield?

Mr. BOYLAN. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BLANTON. What would my friend from New York have him do—lay down?

Mr. BOYLAN. Further, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TINKHAM] said:

Well, I do not assume that the honorable Representative from Texas would want any unnecessary killing.

Mr. BLANTON. When a police officer goes to arrest a man, I think he ought to arrest him.

Mr. BLANTON. I think he ought to.

Mr. BOYLAN. Is it not a nice statement for a Member of this House to favor the killing of men, women, or children for mere minor violations of this wonderful prohibition law.

Mr. BLANTON. I am not in favor of anybody being killed. But when officers of the United States arrest hardened criminals, and such thugs attempt to kill such officers, I want the Government officers to effect the arrest even if they have to kill the criminal to defend their own lives. That is my position.

Mr. BOYLAN. My amendment provides for a reduction in the appropriation for the Prohibition Bureau of $3,000,000. On account of the business slump, we could easily dispense with the services of at least 1,000 enforcement officers. Their salaries would approximate the amount of the proposed reduction.

I would like to call the attention of the House to the fact that the sentiment of the country has changed about this "noble experiment." Every special election held for a congressional seat has resulted in the election of a wet. You gentlemen should see the error of standing up for a law that is universally discredited and that will in a short time be wiped off our statute books.

For 11 years every species of oppression has been used to secure its observance. The most sacred rights of the individual have been violated; homes have been entered without due process of law; telephone wires have been tapped; property has been destroyed; men, women, and even little children have been shot down on the highways of our country; all these atrocities have been perpetrated upon our citizens—all in the "sacred cause" of prohibition.

I appeal to you dry Members to rise and assert your rights without fear of any enforcement organization and support my amendment for a fair and reasonable cut in the appropriation for the Prohibition Bureau. [Applause.]

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. RAGON].

Mr. RAGON. Mr. Chairman, I am not here to express any particular views on the prohibition question. I will say, however, in my eight years of experience in the House, in which time I have had a splendid opportunity to visualize the assault upon and the defense of the prohibition law, I have about come to the conclusion that it is the most securely fool-proof law there is on all the statutes of the United States, because in this time it has successfully placed a granite front to all the bitter and unrelenting attacks of the gentlemen who classify themselves as wets as well as withstood the support of a few of its fool friends.

I am not interested this afternoon in discussing the merits or demerits of prohibition, but I am vitally interested this afternoon in the question of enforcement of the prohibition law. In our enthusiasm for either the prohibition side or the wet side of the question it ill behooves Representatives of the people of the United States in Congress here assembled to forget the purposes to which this present phase of the bill is directed, which is a proper enforcement of the prohibition law.

Mr. MAAS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAGON. I would prefer not to yield. If it is an urgent question, I will yield; but I have only five minutes.

Mr. MAAS. I consider it an urgent question. Does the gentleman consider it more important to enforce this law than to feed American citizens who are hungry?

Mr. RAGON. No; of course not.

Mr. MASS. But you are appropriating all the money they have asked for this law.

Mr. RAGON. Yes; and I would even go farther. Be seated; I can not yield to the gentleman for any of these wet speeches. Give the enforcement of this law a square deal. It has never had one. You may be a wet or you may be a dry; but whatever you are, give the mandates of your country's Constitution a square deal.

I have seen these little challenges come up about a proper appropriation for carrying on the enforcement of this law. If it is a bad law, the best way for you fellows to get rid of it is to properly enforce it. That will kill it, if it is a bad law, quicker than anything else; will it not?

Mr. LINTHICUM. But you can not do it.

Mr. RAGON. All right; if you can not do it, then trust to the people who sent you here to have sense enough to know that they can not do it; but I say to you gentlemen this is the only law I have heard since I have been in Congress here attacked day in and day out on the floor of this House, and they have even carried it to the point of trying to dwarf the money we appropriate to enforce it. Why, it is so all-important that the wets of the two parties here in the House can not enlist their services under one man as floor leader, but must have a twin leadership under the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LINTHICUM], representing the Democratic side, and the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BECK] to properly represent the Republican ideas. Some of us wonder if legislative strategy is the only reason for this.

So, with gentlemen like that, with their astuteness and their broadness of intellect, fighting this law day in and day out, I say to you I do not wonder there is some sentiment somewhere in the United States that this law ought to be violated at the discretion of the individual. We may differ in our opinions on prohibition, but we can not differ, as Americans, on the propriety of enforcement.

My friend, Mr. MAAS, has just interposed a question here that I think if he had read the report he perhaps would not have asked; and that is, Why give such importance to the enforcement of the prohibition law, and why not diminish the present amount given in this bill as we have reduced every other item? In this he is incorrect.

I am sure, gentlemen, if you will take the time to look at the report on page 12, you will find that similar action is taken with respect to the enforcement of the antitrust laws and immigration laws. This is due to the difficulty in enforcement. We have numerous laws difficult of enforcement, and prohibition is one of them. A Government that can within a few months organize 4,000,000 men and raise $26,000,000,000 to bring the most potent foreign military force ever organized to its knees in a comparatively short time can not enforce a criminal statute when it sets itself seriously to the task of doing so? I do not care what you say or believe, I think it can.

All right. If my friend from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR] is going to get up here and appeal for economy to reduce this appropriation for prohibition, why is he not likewise interested in the reduction of the appropriation for the enforcement of the antitrust law and the immigration law? [Applause.]

Mr. O'CONNOR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAGON. Yes.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I want to say that I am for the reduction of the appropriation in both of those items. [Applause.]

Mr. RAGON. That is a good answer, but my friend got up, and with considerable vehemence, took the floor inveighing against the enforcement of the prohibition law, and said at the time that we were not keeping step with the economies of the program when we did not reduce this appropriation for the enforcement of prohibition and yet failed to say anything in favor of reducing the appropriation for strict enforcement of immigration laws and the strict enforcement of the antitrust law. So I say that my friend from New York, with all due respect, should be consistent in the matter.

So I say you should vote to-day to enforce the Constitution of the United States and the laws enacted under it in this provision we are considering now.

Let us forget the question of whether we are for or against the amendment, let us not make a display here when the galleries are crowded with people, who, as my friend from Michigan says, represent the educational forces of America. When we sit here in the presence of these people who are instructing the youth of this country on the Constitution and Government, the legislative and executive system of our country, let us not inveigh against the enforcement of a law that was given them as a solemn mandate in the Constitution of the United States.

Bring on your referendum for repeal, bring on your bill for a modification of the Volstead Act, let us meet them on their merits, but in the name of all that is good, do not stand up here and say in the face of the Constitution that you will not enforce the law. [Applause.]

Mr. BECK. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA].

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Arkansas makes an appeal for law enforcement, and criticizes Members for calling attention to the fact that of all the reductions in the appropriation bill there is no reduction in the item for the enforcement of prohibition.

I agree with the gentleman from Arkansas as to the enforcement of this law, and would like to see prohibition enforcement commence right in those sections of the country which pretend to be for it—it would be wholesome and useful. Let prohibition commence at home. [Applause.] I would be willing to add to the appropriations for enforcement right in the gentleman's own State. [Applause.] But it is, Mr. Chairman, the squandering of millions of dollars on a law—not that the wets in Congress refuse to enforce but a law that the majority of the American people do not want enforced, and do not respect or obey. We would not have the thousands and thousands of bootleggers if we did not have hundreds of thousands and millions of individuals who buy their wares. It is the universal demand for liquor that creates this situation. It is the universal demand and consumption of liquor which makes enforcement hopeless. It is the universal desire on the part of the people to obtain and consume liquor in all and every State of the Union which makes enforcement impossible. We surely are within our rights to refer to these conditions and endeavor to bring an end to this impossible law, thereby saving millions and millions of dollars to the taxpayers.

I ask the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. RAGON], I ask any outstanding dry, and will even include the newly elected loud-speaker for the drys, my good friend, Mr. BLANTON, from Texas, to point out one other law which American gentlemen, almost without exception, will witness the violation of without resentment. Is there any American gentleman who would witness a violation of our counterfeiting laws without protest? Is there any American citizen who would engage in a nation-wide acquiescence in the violation of any other law such as there is in prohibition? Then why continue this legalized mockery? Let us put an end to it. I will go one with the gentleman from Arkansas. I will stand here and vote for every cent that he will recommend for the enforcement of prohibition at the present time, now a part of the Constitution, if he will stand up and vote for the equal enforcement of laws to carry out the intent of the fifteenth amendment. [Applause.] It is just as much a part of my Constitution as is the eighteenth amendment.

In considering this matter from a dollars-and-cents standpoint, at this time we should consider not only the appropriations provided for in this bill for enforcement but we should add to them the additional cost of our penal institutions, then to that the additional cost of the Federal courts, and then the additional cost of the marshals and the personnel that are necessary under attempted prohibition enforcement, and the money so appropriated, together with the loss in taxes, would amount to over $750,000,000. That is the cost of prohibition without enforcement. If gentlemen really want to reduce expenses and reduce taxes, repeal prohibition, which runs into hundreds of millions of dollars, instead of seeking to abolish the Children's Bureau in order to make economies so as to balance the Budget. In addition to that, I should add the amount of money involved in the loss to the States and the municipalities through loss in license and excise taxes, assuming we take the definition of liquor as given by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. FINLEY]. If it is so bad as he says, if it is so dangerous, then let us put it under proper Government control and not leave it under the control of racketeers and criminals. I say we must face this issue. I admit we can not face it on an appropriation bill, but you gentlemen who have been sitting with us for the last 10 years see that the American people are protesting and that each year the protest increases in this House. [Applause.] We are certain of success, because prohibition has proved to be a failure and the American people will not continue an unsuccessful experiment.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. SHREVE. Mr. Chairman, I yield six minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SIMMONS].

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. Chairman, I came to this discussion this afternoon with the distinct understanding that I had gotten from reading the stories in the daily press that we were here to be confronted with a movement on the part of the wets to reduce this appropriation for prohibition enforcement. When I came into the Chamber, I went to the Clerk's desk and asked to see the amendment that had been offered to find out how much it was proposed we should reduce the appropriation for prohibition enforcement and was told that no amendment was pending. Then I went to several of my wet friends on the floor of the House and said, "How much do you men want to cut this appropriation?" and not one man was willing to say that he was ready to take a chance to move to cut the appropriation one penny until Mr. BOYLAN broke away from the rest of the wets and had the courage to say that he would move to cut the appropriation.

Mr. BOYLAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes, sir.

Mr. BOYLAN. The reason that no amendment was offered is due to the fact that by agreement of the House this particular section of the bill was not to be taken up until to-day.

Mr. SIMMONS. But the discussion has been carried on here to-day, and the gentleman from New York has been the only man willing to say that he wanted to cut it one penny.

A MEMBER. Oh, no.

Mr. SIMMONS. One other gentleman says "no" and leaves the Chamber.

Mr. MAAS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMMONS. If the gentleman is willing to say how much he is willing to cut it.

Mr. MAAS. I am willing to eliminate it entirely. I would not vote a dollar for it. [Applause.]

Mr. SIMMONS. That is all I yielded for.

Mr. MAAS. That is enough.

Mr. SIMMONS. Here is a man in this House, sworn to uphold the law and enforce the Constitution, who says that he is ready to render it absolutely inoperative in a matter that he does not like. I think we have reached a time in the House when we ought to find out whether or not men sworn in this body to enforce the law are willing to see that it is enforced and enforced properly. [Applause.] Then the gentleman from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR] takes the floor and says that the committee are guilty of cowardice, because they do not cut this appropriation. How long since is it that men in this body have the right to judge others in that manner? I think I know something of the men who handled this bill, something of the men who studied it, and the charge of cowardice leveled against any member of that subcommittee is absolutely unjustified. Then he would have branded the rest of the membership of the House with cowardice when he says, "Oh, yes; the time is coming when we will find out how men stand on this floor, because on the 14th of March you are going to say where you stand, for then we are going to compel you to go on record." I say to the gentleman from New York that there may be men who believe as he does who fear to go on record in this House, and I say to you now that you need not wait until the 14th of March to find out how I am going to vote. I am going to vote against the resubmission of the eighteenth amendment. And there are a great many others. If the gentleman has the courage that he charges men with not having on the floor of this House, let me say to him that there are a number of us here who are ready this day to go on record and vote on this issue, if you will only make your motion to cut the appropriation.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMMONS. If the gentleman is willing to say how much he wants to cut this appropriation.

Mr. O'CONNOR. If the gentleman heard my entire remarks, he would have heard me say that I believe there should not be a vote on what I call collateral issues, such as this, until we get to the fundamental vote on resubmission. I would not vote on a collateral issue such as this at this time.

Mr. SIMMONS. The gentleman is ready to come in here and get his newspapers to carry his wet speeches, but does not have the courage to submit any one of these issues to this Congress.

I am ready to vote to-day with you on the question of whether or not the House of Representatives is ready to vote the money needed to enforce the prohibition laws of this country. I am ready to help the gentleman get a record vote on it. If there are other wets who are ready to say they will vote on that and say how much they want to cut this appropriation, I am ready to vote on it.

I am talking to you wet people, who are always perfectly willing to take advantage of every opportunity to spread your views; you have told the country you are going to cut this appropriation for prohibition enforcement; there is only one gentleman, the gentleman from New York [Mr. BOYLAN], who is ready to offer an amendment to cut the appropriation, and one other gentleman who says that he would cut it all out.

Mr. BOILEAU. I will vote to cut it all out.

Mr. SIMMONS. I will say to the gentleman from Wisconsin what I said to the gentleman from Minnesota. The gentleman from New York said something about bankrupting the United States to enforce prohibition. How absurd. This appropriation amounts to but 9 cents per capita per year.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. SCHAFER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMMONS. My time has expired.

Mr. SCHAFER. Twenty-nine States in the Union have laws against wire tapping. Will the gentleman support the enforcement of those laws?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Nebraska has expired.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HARLAN].

Mr. HARLAN. Mr. Chairman, opposition to adequate appropriations for the enforcement of criminal law means but one thing—the encouragement of anarchy. On the other hand, submission to a law which one is convinced violates the wishes of a substantial majority of the people and is unnecessarily oppressive is but a tolerance of tyranny. The action of the Judiciary Committee of this Congress in refusing to allow the people of the States to vote their sentiments on the repeal of the eighteenth amendment, together with the ever-growing appetite of the dry bloc for more and greater appropriations, has, I submit, made the choice between these two odious things unescapable.

Nor should that choice be difficult for those who inherit the traditions of the Boston tea party. The path toward anarchy will by comparison be smooth and pleasant. With that purpose in mind, as long as Congress arrogates to itself the prerogative of telling the people, who own this Government, that they shall not be permitted to vote on what they desire in our basic law, I for one shall not vote for any appropriation bill that provides one dime to enforce the prohibition law.

With those in Congress favoring a resubmission of the eighteenth amendment slightly in the minority, this proposal may not appear at all threatening. However, there are few appropriation bills that do not produce opposition on many other grounds, and it is not too much to hope that in time combined opposition may require this deluge of prohibition-enforcement waste to be set forth alone for public inspection in all its silly and profligate detail. For example, the $100,000 which we voted for the other day to enforce prohibition among the Indian tribes all tucked away in the Interior Department bill will be placed where it belongs and added to the total. We may even be able to allocate the cost of maintenance of our vast army of unemployed bootleggers in United States penitentiaries.

If and when Congress permits the people to exercise their franchise on this subject, pending that verdict, I should favor granting the Anti-Saloon League and its handmaiden, the present Republican administration—as distinguished from the Republican Party—all the funds they crave to demonstrate in finality the utter hopelessness and futility of their program. This proposition should by no means be distasteful to them because they proclaim with great vehemence that the people will never tolerate the repeal of the eighteenth amendment. Therefore, if this Congress should adopt that policy, the dry forces will have for all time to come plenty of revenue to enforce their pet theory of paternal government.

The problem of alcohol is about as old as the Aryan race; and if we fail to solve it in this decade, future generations may forgive us for our stupidity.

However, our American experiment in democracy is still but an infant in history. If we pursue an erroneous course in government for a comparatively short period, we mold customs and establish precedents that may well bring upon us the curse of future generations. I submit that the persistent attitude of this Congress in refusing to allow the people to vote on a proposition which even in this financial cataclysm continuously calls for more attention and discussion than any other question in our civilization is establishing a precedent directly opposite to the conception of the founders of our Government.

When the United States Constitution emerged from the convention it fully satisfied no one. Both the large and the small States feared it, and John Quincy Adams critically called it "a bundle of compromises." The one provision that finally made it acceptable to the people of the States was the apparent ease with which it could be amended. This provision for amendment, Article V, was the one contribution to the Constitution made by the patron saint of the Republican Party, Alexander Hamilton. James Madison, destined later to become one of democracy's shining lights, in commenting on this section, said:

> The people were in fact the fountain of all power; by resorting to them all difficulties were gotten over. They could alter the Constitution as they pleased.

That statement would be true to-day if it were not for the development and functioning of political parties and blocs which the founders of our Government seemed wholly unable to foresee. None of us, I am sure, would criticize party government to-day. It is necessary, and those countries in which it operates most successfully enjoy the greatest freedom. But, I submit, we should all be equally zealous to keep the amendment of our Constitution close to the people and free from entanglement with other party issues. This was in the hearts of the framers of the Constitution when it was said:

> We, the people of the United States, in order to form a more perfect union—

And so forth.

It was in the mind of James Madison when he said:

> The people were in fact the fountain of all power. They could alter the Constitution as they pleased.

A number of States have attempted to bring constitutional amendments closer to the people by a referendum on State legislative action in approving constitutional amendments, but our Supreme Court has nullified such efforts. The progressive platform of 1912 contained a pledge to provide a simpler and more direct method of constitutional amendment. A number of State political platforms have contained similar proposals.

Reduced to final terms our present difficulties are due to the fact that as to constitutional amendment Congress is no longer a deliberative body. Its Members are so bound up with blocs and party issues and the parties themselves are so helpless in the hands of these organized blocs that there is no freedom of thought for deliberation. When the fact is gone why perpetuate the fiction?

At least until some other method of constitutional amendment is devised, providing the people with a real referendum on their fundamental law, I submit there is just one way to restore the Constitution to the people, and that is for Congress to determine just two facts pertaining to any proposed amendment:

First. Is the subject matter of the proposal a fundamental rule of government and not merely a statute?

Second. Do approximately half of the population desire a vote on the question involved?

If both of these questions are answered in the affirmative, then congressional responsibility should consist in phrasing the proposal in good English and in handing it to the people. In this respect the fact that the proposed repeal of the eighteenth amendment happens to touch the question of prohibition should make no difference in principle. It is simply a question of fairness in government and preserving the spirit of democracy. It should have the same appeal to all citizens who believe in fair play, whether they be as wet as the Pacific Ocean or as dry as Death Valley.

The Hon. MORRIS SHEPPARD, reputed to be the author of the eighteenth amendment, on July 30, 1917, said:

> The Member of Congress who will not vote for the submission of a constitutional amendment to the decision of the States, where it belongs, unless he personally believes it should become a part of the Constitution, usurps the function of the States, arrogates to himself and the Federal Government a prerogative that belongs to the States, and violates the very essence of their sovereignty.

The Hon. WESLEY L. JONES, author of the famous and foolish "5 and 10" enforcement law, on July 31, 1917, said:

> I believe it to be my duty as a Senator to vote to submit an amendment to the State legislatures when there is a strong, matured, widespread sentiment and demand from the people for such an amendment. To refuse to do so is to act as the master rather than the representative of the people.

Is there such a demand on the part of the people? Observe for a moment those congressional districts in the last election which were normally Republican and where prohibition was not an issue—the first and ninth Ohio and the thirtieth Pennsylvania districts. In spite of the tremendous drift away from the policies, or rather lack of policies, of this administration those districts remained safely Republican. Gaze again at three equally strong Republican districts where prohibition was an issue—the third and twelfth Ohio and eighth Michigan districts. There the people voted for and elected antiprohibition Democrats.

Nine States have in one manner or another directly repudiated national prohibition. They are Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Nevada, Illinois, New York, Wisconsin, Connecticut, Maryland, and Montana, States containing over one-fourth of our population and paying three-fifths of our Federal income tax. The three polls of the Literary Digest show a progressive national revulsion against this fatuous and oppressive law. The members of the American Bar Association, the American Medical Association, the American Federation of Labor, and the American Legion have all expressed themselves as opposed to our present prohibition effort. Where could we find a more representative cross section of American citizenship?

Nine of the ten signers of the Wickersham report declared themselves either in favor of the submission of the question of repeal or modification of the eighteenth amendment to the people. Here is what they said:

> Henry W. Anderson: "It is proposed * * * that the eighteenth amendment be modified or revised."
> Newton D. Baker: "A submission of the amendment * * * would test the present sentiment of the country."
> Ada L. Comstock: "I * * * favor an immediate attempt at change."
> William S. Kenyon: "The feeling of the people on the subject should be registered by a referendum."
> Monte M. Lemann: "I see no alternative but repeal of the amendment."
> Frank J. Loesch: "Steps should be taken immediately to revise the amendment."
> Paul J. McCormick: "I favor and recommend such action (submission of the eighteenth amendment.)"

We paid these specialists a half million dollars to prepare and deliver their opinion. Shall we now repudiate their advice and follow that of the Rev. Scott McBride and the notorious James Cannon, jr.?

The other day a number of us voted to submit to the people the so-called "lame-duck" amendment with but a fraction of the evidence of a popular demand which is manifest for a vote on the eighteenth amendment. Many of us thought that this "lame-duck" amendment at best was of no value and possibly even harmful, yet we voted to submit it to the people, as there was some substantial evidence of a popular wish to have the question submitted.

There is no more reason for perpetually reenacting this anachronistic farce in which an all-wise, nonpartisan Congress is supposed to deliberate on the expediency of trusting a constitutional amendment to popular vote than there is of operating the Electoral College in its originally conceived capacity as a deliberative body.

Just now it is not a question as to how the people should vote on this repeal. The important question is: Shall they have the privilege of voting, or shall Congress, under the dominance of a group of smug, self-satisfied reformers, say to the people, "We alone know what is best for you; we got what we want into the Constitution, and now, by the powers, you shall not have a vote on a change"? These are not imaginary words. They very closely paraphrase an editorial of William Allen White, the dry Republican mouthpiece of Emporia, Kans. They epitomize the basic doctrines of bigotry and tyranny from the dawn of history. They would well have become the tongue of Lord North, and were, no doubt, in the mind of Louis XIV when he said, "L'état c'est moi."

To combat such a spirit drastic methods are necessary. If we may judge from the scandal-strewed pathway of this noble experiment, putting a knot in the purse strings is the most effective one possible. This will not disturb the idealist talking from his pulpit, but the "practical prohibitionist" will soon lose interest. [Applause.]

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. KARCH].

Mr. KARCH. Mr. Chairman, it is unfortunate that a Member of Congress is required to limit his discussion of an important question to a comparatively short period of time. It is difficult to make a logical argument on a subject of such vast importance as the prohibition question within the time a Member can reasonably expect to be accorded him in this House.

I am not finding fault with the system that prevails here of limiting the time of a Member in which he may discuss a proposition, because I realize that on account of our very large membership of approximately 435 and the very large number of subjects and measures that deserve the attention of the House it is both unjust and impracticable to extend any one Member unlimited time to address the House.

I only wish to express my regret that such a situation prevails, and request the indulgence of my fellow Members in what may appear to be a summary presentation of an argument on this very important and far-reaching problem, and the apparent omission of facts and circumstances which should, in the arraignment that I am about to make against prohibition, be stated to support in logical sequence the charges that I shall inveigh against this nefarious institution.

I dare say that there has not been a question before the American people since the Civil War, which has been so widely and voluminously spoken upon and written about and agitated by the citizens at large, as has the prohibition question. That fact alone stamps that question with great magnitude and transcending importance.

I do not wish to have you gentlemen, who have not yet learned to know me well, believe that I am obsessed with the subject—prohibition. I wish you all to know that I have given this question careful thought for many years, and that I have, at all times, considered it with an open mind and aside from my own native predilections, with no end in view except the welfare of our Republic and the weal and virtue of its citizenship.

If I could be convinced that the welfare of this Nation required an absolutely abstemious people, and that this new and anomalous system of prohibition under which we are operating had accomplished or would ever accomplish that end, I, as a loyal citizen and a sincere humanitarian, would most cheerfully subscribe to and abide by this kind of prohibition.

But is there a man within hearing of my voice—is there a man within the borders of this Nation—fair to himself, fair to his country, and fair to his conscience who can say that the two things which I have just mentioned do in fact exist?

If they do exist, then why this tremendous agitation and this overwhelming protest? Twelve years is a long period in the affairs of one's life and in the affairs of a nation. Prohibition has had a trial, and a fair trial. The Government has been earnest and generous in its efforts to make it a success.

There has not been a time when the administration of prohibition has not been in the hands of those who wrought this reform, who believe in it, and who have strained the uttermost resources of our Government, within the law and beyond the law, to demonstrate its feasibility.

Prohibition has been administered under the régimes of three Presidents who were, at heart and soul, prohibitionists. The drys not only furnished all of the personnel, from chief down to the lowest agent charged with its enforcement administratively, but, I here make the charge, that their voice was heard and that their voice was obeyed in the selection of the United States attorneys and United States marshals and United States judges under whose function the final execution of the law has hitherto been reposed.

The Government of the United States, backed by a patient and loyal citizenship, up to this hour has sacrificed, directly and indirectly, $7,000,000,000 of the taxes of a hard-pressed and struggling people in order that prohibition should have a fair trial. Courts have gone to excess in procedure and in penalties to enforce prohibition. This law is the most drastic law on the statute books of any nation in the world. The fourth and fifth amendments to the Constitution of the United States have been practically abrogated. What was an innocent act of a human being since the dawn of creation has been denominated and has been treated as a heinous felony; forfeitures and attainder have been superimposed upon the specific penalties which themselves under any standard of classified crime and under our constitutional inhibitions against excessive penalties are both obnoxious and unconscionable.

The pursuit of a murderer or a kidnaper, or even a traitor to his country, is attended by no more drastic authority than is the pursuit and apprehension of a citizen suspected of having violated the Volstead Act.

We have judges in this country and we have legislators in this House who have publicly announced that it is entirely just and proper and within the law to shoot and kill a subject, suspected of having violated the Volstead Act, fleeing from or resisting arrest by a prohibition agent—mark you, my friend—for an offense which is innocent per se and by every reasonable standard only a misdemeanor.

When and where, I ask you gentlemen who justify the slaughter of our citizens clothed with the presumption of innocence under our humane institutions, was it the law that the apprehending officer possessed the right to kill a fleeing or a resisting suspect of any offense under the grade of common-law felony, except where the officer was in imminent danger of his life or great bodily harm? When and where, I ask you gentlemen, was there a law confiscating the goods and the chattels and the homesteads of the citizens or of a subject guilty of no greater offense than to make or possess home-brew beer? Time forbids me here to enumerate further the violence and the tyranny which have been invoked and which the friends and administrators of prohibition justify and condone in the execution of this law.

Therefore I say that the prohibition laws and the regulations of this country for the enforcement of prohibition are the most drastic that could be devised in the name of an enlightened democracy, and yet they have proved impotent to thwart the desire and determination of the citizen of high and low degree to violate the prohibition act with scorn and impunity.

Who says that prohibition can be enforced? The press of the Nation says that it can not be enforced. The members of the American Bar Association, typifying the intelligence and the patriotism and the conservatism of our country, say that it can not. The American Federation of Labor, representing millions who toil for the Nation, who are imbued with the loftiest patriotism, says that it can not be enforced and that it ought not to be enforced. The American Medical Association, whose members have consecrated their lives for the good of humanity, says that it can not be enforced and that it ought not to be enforced. The American Legion, speaking for every veteran who offered his life that this Nation might live and that democracy should be safe everywhere and for all time, says it can not be enforced. The economists of our country tell us that prohibition has been a failure. The heads of the colleges and schools of our country tell us that prohibition has been a disaster and a failure. Yes; and every mother and every father in this country proclaims it a failure and prays that it may be repealed to save our boys and girls from the maelstrom of depravity into which they are drawn daily by the hundreds and the thousands.

I say that nobody says that prohibition is being enforced except the zealots and the fanatics and the dogmatists and the intolerant and the blue-law crusaders and the Ku-Klux Klan and the moochers and grafters and racketeers who seek to mollify their nefarious avocations in the name of a sanctified cause.

Prohibition has not been a success in any country in which it has ever been tried. But that experience alone does not persuade me, because I do not know just what kind of prohibition they had and what particular elements are at work in these foreign countries—about whose forms and systems I know very little—militating against the success of their prohibition.

But I say prohibition will never be tolerated in the United States because it is contrary to the genius of our kind of democracy. I am assuming that it is conceded that the American people by nature abhor sumptuary legislation and anything that savors of paternalism. That peculiar attribute of the American people has been termed by the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BECK] as the ethos of American society.

Furthermore, we have concrete proof that the American people will not tolerate prohibition—not only by their conduct of ruthless disobedience but by their expressed will in a series of referenda which have been conducted recently, both through elective machinery of our States and the Literary Digest poll, one of which is in progress at this very hour, each of these methods revealing that at least two-thirds of our adult electorate are dissatisfied with prohibition.

The result of a poll conducted by the Birmingham American Legion Post is announced and shows a big majority for out and out repeal. Considering that this occurred in the South it is regarded as indicative of a great change in sentiment in this entire section. Analysis of the poll shows that 84 per cent of the lawyers are for repeal and 85 per cent of the business men are of the same opinion. Forty-one of forty-four physicians favor modification or repeal. Only the ministers want a continuance, and they voted 44 to 1 for "better enforcement."

And now Bradstreet's declares that American business leaders are wet and have so indicated. Having questioned a number of them—two or three in each community—Bradstreet's reports that 55 per cent believe business would be helped by repeal of the Volstead Act, while 14 per cent believe it would be helped by modification. Early in 1930, the Du Pont poll indicated that Delaware voters favor the repeal of their State enforcement act. The Harvard Crimson's poll of 14 eastern and midwestern colleges went wet by three to one.

Finally, in referenda connected with the 1930 elections, Rhode Island voted for repeal of the eighteenth amendment, Massachusetts and Illinois for repeal of their State enforcement acts and the latter for repeal of the Volstead Act and the eighteenth amendment.

Eighty-four per cent of the ballots received in the first tabulation by States in the Nation-wide prohibition poll of the Literary Digest now being conducted are in favor of repeal of the eighteenth amendment, it was announced last night.

The 1932 tabulation, in detail, was as follows:

State	Amendment	For repeal	Total
Georgia	1,664	3,588	5,252
Illinois	493	2,961	3,454
Indiana	1,909	3,540	5,449
Maryland	2,208	10,616	12,824
New York	32,338	224,877	257,215
North Carolina	4,999	7,142	12,141
Virginia	1,669	4,477	6,146
Total	51,285	272,265	323,550

As stated at the outset, I regret to make bald statements without following up with a specific verification of them. But I will take time at this juncture to invoke some basic authority, limited as it may be, to demonstrate my contention that no law which does not fundamentally emanate from the sovereign, that does not comport with the individual's conception of his inate liberty which he exercised many generations by, so to speak, prescription, will command his respect, nor will it endure.

Aristotle, one of the wise men of ancient Greece, and the greatest political philosopher known in all history, discovered this law, and the statement of it runs through all of his works. This is the doctrine of Aristotle:

The suppression of long-established habits brings the overthrow of innovating governments, because the old habits persist among the people; characters are not so easily changed as laws. If a constitution is to be permanent, all the parts of a society must desire it to be maintained.

Woodrow Wilson had in mind the same principle enunciated by Aristotle when he said:

In all matters having to do with the personal habits and customs of large numbers of our people we must be certain that the established processes of legal change are followed. In no other way can the salutary object sought to be accomplished by the great reforms of this character be made satisfactory and permanent.

Wilson upon another occasion said:

You can not regulate the morals and habits of a great cosmopolitan people by placing unreasonable restrictions upon their liberties and freedom. All such attempts can only end in failure and disappointment. In the last analysis, in these matters that seek to regulate personal habits and customs, public opinion is the great regulator.

It is impossible to divorce the problem of enforcement from that of enforceability. (P. 1 Wickersham Commission report, p. 1, reprint.)

It (prohibition) remains one of acrimonious debate, with the most zealous adherents of the latest solution compelled to admit grave difficulties and serious resulting abuses. (P. 5 commission report, p. 3, reprint.)

Settled habits and social customs do not yield readily to legislative fiats. (P. 6 commission report, p. 4, reprint.)

The proponents of the law paid no heed to the admonition that "no law can be effectively enforced except with the assistance and cooperation of the law-abiding element." On the contrary, the passage of the act and its enforcement were urged with a spirit of intolerant zeal that awakened an equally intolerant opposition, and the difficulties now being experienced in rallying public sentiment in support of the eighteenth amendment result largely from that spirit of intolerance.

From a sermon delivered by Henry Ward Beecher in Plymouth Church, Brooklyn, December 3, 1882, I read:

Any law that takes hold of a man's daily life can not prevail in a community unless the vast majority of the community are actively in favor of it.

To attempt to create morality by law is of all things supremely and superbly foolish. Morality can create law, and may help in its execution; but law can not create morality. The feeling must be in existence first, and give itself form, substance, and power afterwards. The law must be an expression of the foregoing state of conscience and judgment, and not a means by which to create that judgment and that conscience. If we could create moral feeling by law, we could get, now and then, a whole legislature which would have all men converted in a year; but we can not.

In America a law with no popular public sentiment behind it, or with no active good will behind it, is like a gun with no powder in it.

Next comes the question of the right of the law to determine whether a man shall or shall not drink. On that subject I am in favor of men's not drinking unless you tell them they shall not drink.

Forget not, I pray you, the rights of personal freedom, self-government is the foundation of all our political and social institutions. Seek not to enforce upon your brother by legislative enactment the virtue that he can possess only by the dictates of his own conscience and the energy of his will. (John Quincy Adams.)

LINCOLN ON THE CONSTITUTION AND LAW ENFORCEMENT

(From p. 209, Carl Sandburg's Lincoln)

I should not care to be the candidate of a party having as its only platform "the Constitution, the Union, and the enforcement of the laws." The Constitution, as we understand it, has been the shibboleth of every party or malcontent from the Hartford convention that wanted to secede from slave territory and the "blue light" burners, who were in British sympathy in 1812, to John C. Calhoun and the South Carolina nullification. No law is stronger than is the public sentiment where it is to be enforced.

By Arthur Twining Hadley, president emeritus, Yale University

Oone of the greatest dangers which now confront us is the increasing demand for ill-considered legislation, and the increasing readiness of would-be reformers to rely on authority rather than on public sentiment for securing their ends. When the Republic was first founded we had more to fear from the lawbreakers than from the lawmakers, from the absence of authority than from its overexercise. People believed in individual liberty and even sometimes inclined to carry that idea to extremes. But this love of liberty has gradually given place to a zeal for standardization. The new democracy, in the words of Lord Farrer, is passionately benevolent and passionately fond of power. To-day it is from the lawmaker rather than from the lawbreaker that our American traditions of self-government have most to fear.

Now, my friends, let us be men. Let us have the courage to meet a true situation. Let us disillusion ourselves. Let us stop patronizing to these forces of prejudice and fanaticism and, to a very large extent, provincialism.

The time has come when people no longer will temporize on this subject. They are in no good humor to await our tardy realization of what is the notorious aspect of the public mind.

Is anyone deceiving himself in the belief that any of our major political parties will prevail at the next election without an unequivocal expression in its program for the repeal of the eighteenth amendment? Is there anyone here who even hopes that his political party will declare for adherence to the eighteenth amendment and the prohibition that we have by virtue of it? Do any of you gentlemen seriously believe that either of the two old parties will nominate a dry for the Presidency? Universally as it appears to be conceded that Mr. Hoover will be nominated by the Republican Party next June, let me make this prediction, and I wish you all to remember it: That Mr. Hoover will not be nominated for the Presidency of the United States by the Republican Party unless he is willing to accept a platform declaring unequivocally for a resubmission of the eighteenth amendment to the people.

The political leaders of those sections of our country, heretofore known to be dry, have already accepted the candidacy of Franklin D. Roosevelt as the Democratic nominee who would not accept—and could not expect to receive—the nomination unless he and the Democratic platform would promise the people, in no uncertain terms, that the eighteenth amendment would be resubmitted, and that, in the meantime, his administration be committed to legislation legalizing beverages not intoxicating in fact, to be burdened with a revenue that will rehabilitate the solvency of our Nation. If eventually we must abandon prohibition, why not now?

Let me make another prediction which I know will come true: Do you gentleman know that there is in the making right now a new party—a third party—which is suspending its decision to enter the field—only to await whether any of the old parties will declare for a progressive program, including a declaration for the resubmission of the eighteenth amendment?

My prediction is that unless either the Republican Party or the Democratic Party declare in convention for the progressive things that the progressive people—who are made up of the common people, and who are in the majority—demand, this new party to which I refer, sponsored by the League for Independent Political Action, will step into the breach with its program including, as I have stated, the resubmission of the eighteenth amendment. If the exigencies arise which would draw this new party into action, it will prevail at the election, and this country might for the first time in many a generation, if ever, have a government by a plurality instead of a government by a majority.

We are asked here to vote these eleven or more million dollars for the enforcement of prohibition, when we know that it is only that many more millions thrown to the winds. Director Woodcock has as much as confessed in his testimony before the Senate committee the other day that prohibition can never be enforced within the full purview of the law; that there are classes of violations that can never be reached by the law; that the volume of the violations is so great and so devious that the best he can do is to select and single out those transactions which he will prosecute and those transactions which he will not prosecute, those individuals whom he will prosecute and those individuals whom he will not prosecute.

There is an axiom in fundamental law, effective alike in monarchies and democracies, that the criminal law must within its own terms define the act to be condemned, and that it must operate equally upon all the individuals of the realm, the high and the low, the weak and the strong; the law must be complete, and the prosecutor must have no choice in proceeding against the transgressor.

A fine example is here furnished by the United States Department of Justice, to which every American citizen looks as the exemplar of right, and from which, it is expected, emanate only the highest standard of professional conduct and judicial procedure.

What true American will tolerate a law affecting the lives and the liberties and the property of the people which applies only to those whom the prosecutor will select—opening the door for the exercise of favoritism as well as of reprisal and vengeance? What true American will defend a law which can not and does not stand up on its own bottom; that can not be enforced, on the confession of the Attorney General of the United States, and upon the findings of the Wickersham Commission, the highest and most solemn authority that has ever spoken upon this subject.

I oppose this appropriation because it is a useless expenditure of money, and because it is an indefensible drain upon our financial resources at a time when our Government is trembling before imminent prospects of insolvency and danger of financial collapse. The Nation demands that the situation be reversed and that the accustomed beverages be restored, subject to the imposition of an excise tax that will reach at least one-half billion dollars annually, and save the country from its financial debacle. I am not in favor of voting for one dime of this appropriation, and if that be nullification, make the best of it and I will take the consequences.

Again I say, my friends, that I am not moved here by an obsession; I do not plead my personal privilege to drink beer and whisky, as I have been accustomed to do, nor to promote the brewery and distillery interests of the land. I plead for those millions who are now victimized under the election of the Attorney General of the United States—the poor and the lowly and the meek millions, the laboring masses of the Nation—so that they may enjoy the same privilege to do that which the rich and the influential, the lawyers and the judges, and the Senators and the Representatives, even Presidents, have done and will continue to do with impunity. [Applause.]

Mr. CLANCY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KARCH. I yield.

Mr. CLANCY. The gentleman has heard the wet Members of the House denounced in unmeasured terms to-day by some dry Members. Does the gentleman not think that same bitter criticism of the dry Members applies to the American Legion, the American Federation of Labor, the American Bar Association, the American Medical Association, the American Bankers Association, and other patriotic and professional organizations which are just as wet as the wet Members of this House and which have declared emphatically against the eighteenth amendment?

Mr. KARCH. It applies to 85 per cent of the people of the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SWEENEY].

Mr. SWEENEY. Mr. Chairman, when I first came to this Congress in December I made the statement that I thought the paramount issue before this assembly was Federal relief to the unemployed of this country. I am still of that conviction.

I read the very able and comprehensive survey of the liberal Senator from Wisconsin, Senator ROBERT LA FOLLETTE, Jr., a survey that, in my opinion, indicts this Congress; a survey that, in my opinion, indicts the President of the United States unless we take action to relieve misery and distress. This survey discloses that there are children dying to-day because of the lack of proper food. Many are suffering from tuberculosis because of malnutrition and undernourishment. Thousands of men, women, and children are emaciated because of present conditions. Eight million three hundred thousand human beings are out of employment; 16,600,000 arms are reaching out in supplication, looking for relief.

To-day we are confronted with the spectacle of an appropriation bill asking for millions of dollars to enforce a law that, in my opinion, can not be enforced. This money to be expended in wire tapping, snooping, the hiring of the youth of the land to act as decoys in the purchase of liquor to obtain convictions. The other day a young girl 17 years of age in Akron, Ohio, accused a prohibition agent of hiring her to go out as a decoy and purchase liquor to be used as evidence. He received a year in the penitentiary, according to the dispatch from the Cleveland Press, which I hold in my hand. Let us be honest about this proposition; let us look to the real agency behind the attempt to enforce prohibition legislation.

Ex-Governor Cox, of Ohio, the former standard bearer of the Democratic Party in 1920, expressed a great deal of courage at the Jackson Day dinner at the Mayflower Hotel in this city last month when he said, "Drive back the political ecclesiastics to their pulpits." Of course our friends, the dry Members of this Congress, criticize Governor Cox, but his sentiment is sweeping the land.

I hold in my hand a clipping from the Washington Herald of to-day, dated Sacramento, Calif., February 22, charging the Sacramento Church Federation devotes one-half of its meetings to prohibition. Rev. Lawrence Wilson, pastor of the Memorial Congregational Church, took it severely to task when he said, "I do not believe the church should be made an agency for the enforcement of the laws."

That is the sentiment of all honest-to-God preachers to-day. I will not vote for any appropriation bill carrying with it the expenditure of public money to further attempt to enforce this law.

Mr. BECK. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. SCHAFER]. [Applause.]

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Chairman, in three minutes I can but barely scratch the surface of this fundamental question. I listened to the speech of our distinguished friend from Michigan. He comes from a State which raises about $2,000,000 a year under an excise tax levied on brewers wort which the racketeers use to make wild-cat beer, having an alcoholic content of over 9 per cent in alley breweries. It is well known that brewers wort can only be used to manufacture beer. His argument was that under the eighteenth amendment of the Constitution an individual citizen could not even advocate a change in the amendment.

One listening to his speech and the speech made by the dry gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SIMMONS] would come to a conclusion that the eighteenth amendment specified one-half of 1 per cent as the maximum, the holy of holies, and that the exact amount carried in this appropriation bill must be appropriated for the enforcement of prohibition or we would nullify the eighteenth amendment and our Constitution.

To my Democratic friends on this side of the House who talk much in favor of law enforcement and much in opposition to nullification let me say that I well remember your votes on the census and apportionment bill. When the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TINKHAM] offered an amendment which would enforce the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution, an amendment which, if enforced, would reduce the number of drys in this House by about 30, you stood up practically en masse and voted against it. You did not care about the Constitution then. You forgot all of your opposition to nullification.

The fourth and fifth amendments to the Constitution, which affect the rights and liberties of the American people, were embodied in the Constitution many years before the eighteenth amendment.

The fourth amendment to our Constitution resulted from two abuses practiced by the British Government—the use of general warrants and the use of writs of assistance, authorized under the British Parliament act of 1767. The use of these writs soon led to great opposition, particularly in the Commonwealth of Massachusetts and, the abuses being fresh in the minds of our colonial statesmen, resulted in the fourth amendment to the Constitution. The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects against unreasonable searches as provided in the fourth amendment and the right that they shall not be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against themselves as provided in the fifth amendment is absolutely ignored when we permit Federal law enforcement agents to tap telephone and telegraph wires. Under the practice of tapping these wires, the very sanctity of the home is destroyed, and the person and his house invaded secretly and without warning, subjecting the very privacies of the lives and households of our people to public scrutiny and permitting the testimony of our citizens, obtained in this manner, to be used against them in criminal cases. Twenty-nine States of the Union wrote into their statutes provisions making it a misdemeanor or felony to tap telephone or telegraph wires, and they did not include in such legislation invisible language exempting from the provisions of the prohibitory statutes Federal law enforcement agents, be they engaged in enforcing the prohibition or any other Federal law.

The Supreme Court decision, in the case of Olmstead v. United States (277 U. S.), was rendered not on the question of wire tapping being lawful or unlawful, as the order granting certiorari confined the hearing to the question whether the use in evidence of private telephone conversations intercepted by means of wire tapping violated the fourth and fifth amendments to the Constitution. The decision of the court on this question was a 5-to-4 decision. In delivering the majority opinion, Chief Justice Taft stated:

> Whether the State of Washington may prosecute or punish Federal officers violating this law and those whose messages were intercepted may sue them civilly is not before us.

I submit to my Democratic colleagues, particularly those who have been opposing the pending amendment, for your thought and consideration the words of an eminent American citizen, the last paragraph of the dissenting opinion of Justice Brandeis in the wire-tapping case of Olmstead against the United States, which reads as follows:

> Decency, security, and liberty alike demand that Government officials shall be subjected to the same rules of conduct that are commands to the citizens. In a government of laws, existence of the government will be imperiled if it fails to observe the law scrupulously. Our Government is the potent, the omnipresent teacher. For good or for ill, it teaches the whole people by its example. Crime is contagious. If the Government becomes a lawbreaker, it breeds contempt for law; it invites every man to become a law unto himself; it invites anarchy. To declare that in the administration of the criminal law the end justifies the means—to declare that the Government may commit crimes in order to secure the conviction of a private criminal—would bring terrible retribution. Against that pernicious doctrine this court should resolutely set its face.

I wish I had the time to read the entire opinion of this noble American. [Applause.]

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent, in view of the limited time, to extend my remarks in the RECORD by incorporating that really true American democratic principle as expressed by Justice Brandeis in that dissenting opinion.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SHREVE. Mr. Chairman, I yield six minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ADKINS]. [Applause.]

Mr. ADKINS. Mr. Chairman, owing to the limited time I shall not yield for any questions. I have as a general rule followed the recommendations of committees with reference to items for law enforcement. I know the chairman of the subcommittee and also the ranking member of it. I know the care with which they look into the necessary appropriations which they bring before this House, and I have generally found their judgment mighty good. I find that it takes more money to enforce some of these laws than it takes to enforce others, and with the multitudinous other duties I have to perform I am willing to take their recommendations in connection with these bills and in connection with the enforcement of these various laws. I am willing to believe that they have recommended the necessary appropriations to properly execute such laws.

This seems to be a sort of general field day on prohibition. One gentleman gets up and boasts, by implication, of the courage he had in voting wet. Well, if my district were as wet as his district is, I do not think it would take any courage to vote that way. Then he talks about the lack of courage on the part of the man who fails to vote as he votes. Let me say to that gentleman that if his district were as dry as my district is, he would not have the courage to stand up here and make the speeches he makes, because if he did he would not come to Congress.

I take it that other men here in Congress are striving to represent the sentiment in their districts as honestly as I am on this question.

Another gentleman spoke about the large number of people who are unemployed and how the making of beer would provide a market for our grains. My God, friends, back in the nineties, when we were passing through this sort of a time, I was overseer of the poor in my home township. We had a saloon on every corner and I failed to see those who were on charity drink themselves rich at that time. [Applause.] Nor did I see the farmer get rich in selling his grain out of which to make booze. Corn sold for 18 and 20 cents per bushel. It was my business to look after the poor children.

I never let a child stay out of school for want of clothes or of shoes. I would see their weak fathers go to the corner saloon, tank up during the summer time, and then we would have to take care of his child during the winter in order to keep it in school, keep it warm, and all that sort of thing.

I have lived through those times, and I remember very well the difficulties of enforcement. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania will go back and look up the record, he will see the great complaint that the saloonkeepers themselves made of the lack of enforcement of the law in the city of Philadelphia. The speak-easies were so numerous that they interfered with the legitimate saloon men. Take Pittsburgh or any other large city, and you would find that the lawbreaking element that interfered with the legitimate saloon business at that time was just as prevalent as it is to-day.

They talk about how bad a thing it is to have a respectable citizen brought into court because he has violated the liquor law. They say what a terrible thing that is; but just stop and think about it. We have just as stringent laws against gambling, and we have some right good fellows that like to play poker and like to gamble a little. Of course, it is humiliating when you bring in one of those fellows and make him pay a fine.

In our town, I think, we enforce the liquor law and the antigambling law as well as in any other city of 60,000 people, but about every month we find somebody in some loft running a gambling house and they break it up and fine the fellows—and there are some pretty good fellows, mind you, that play poker; do not forget that. It is just as humiliating to fine those fellows as it is to fine the man who is caught with a little booze in his hand whom they bring in and fine for violating the prohibition law, but, nevertheless, we do it.

There is not anybody here that gets up and says that we ought to abolish the law against gambling. We want to keep the violation down and we want to hold it in check so that we can live with it, the same as the liquor traffic, but I do not care how you handle the liquor traffic, you are going to have trouble with it, and its enforcement is going to be distasteful to some people.

Now, they talk about voting on the question. I was in the legislature when we were in the minority, and we farmers used to ask them to let us say whether we should have a saloon in every township where they would get our hired men drunk and then send them to our homes, where they would puke all over the place, and, of course, our wives would not stand for that and we would have to discharge them, and they would say, "Oh, no; we are not going to let you have a vote. We have got you where we want you and we are going to force this onto you."

We farmers got very tired in those days of having our homes used for an inebriates asylum for the towns which had saloons, and especially those of us who had our help sent home to us drunk sometimes. The best we can do is to keep these liquor violations, gambling, and some other vices down where we can live with them, because we will always have some of them.

So do not come here and make that kind of argument to me. I do not care anything about a vote, so far as I am concerned, and I do not think it requires any courage for me to stand up here and vote dry when every county in my district is dry. But I am not here saying anything about how courageous I am to vote dry. I am not going to embarrass my fellow Member here, who has a very evenly divided district, and I think it ill becomes a man who lives in an overwhelmingly wet district to come here and bullyrag the fellow that lives in a close district when there is nothing to be accomplished by it, because he does not want to go on record with respect to the liquor traffic. [Applause.]

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. MARTIN].

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. Mr. Chairman, I am not going to deliver a speech here on Ten Nights in a Barroom. We all know, and there is no use deceiving ourselves that no constitutional amendment nor supporting law can be enforced which does not have public sentiment behind it, and we know that there are large sections of this country where the sentiment against the eighteenth amendment and its supporting laws is almost unanimously against them.

I was very much interested in hearing my Republican friend from Wisconsin talk to my Democratic friends. As their friend I want to drop this remark to them.

Some 45 or 50 years ago in recurring discussions in this House and in the Senate there was an attempt made to enforce the fourteenth amendment in the Southern States—the so-called force bill. You resisted that because you felt it would have been an infamous and outrageous thing to have turned you over to the negroes, but that measure was kept up here year after year until at last some liberal Republicans from the Northern States joined with you and together you forever killed that measure in this House.

Now, we in the North who come from the liberal sections of the North are just as earnest and as much opposed to prohibition as you were to being ruled by negroes, and we ask that you show the same liberality to us and join with us to put this eighteenth amendment in limbo to-day as is the fourteenth amendment.

Fortunately, I can be very brave on this question, because I came here after a test on the matter in my district.

This Congress and the country for some time have been ruled by the Anti-Saloon League. Its rule has had the effect in all the Northern States of breaking down minority parties because, like Gould's old Erie Railroad in New York, in Democratic States the Anti-Saloon League is Democratic, in Republican States it is Republican, but it is always Anti-Saloon League. In my State of Oregon each candidate who ran for office there submitted to its tyranny—every one—Democrats and Republicans alike. The other Democrats were so gullible they did not know that they were being led right into a trap; but I defied them, and here I am.

Mr. MAAS. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MAAS. The gentleman from Nebraska spoke about the violation of the Constitution, and I would like to ask the Chair if it is any violation of the Constitution to refuse to vote for any specific appropriation?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not think that is a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. MAAS. Neither did I. [Laughter.]

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, I yield four minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. CELLER].

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Chairman, the story I will tell you briefly is a twice-told tale, but I am sure it will bear repetition. It is about a stranger coming into Washington. He asks the police officer, "Where can I get something to drink?" The police officer says, "Walk down two blocks, turn to the right, and there you will see a barber shop. That is the only place in town where you can't get it." [Laughter.]

That reflects the sentiment that exists over the land in every village and every hamlet and every town and city in this country, because people are not in favor of the legislation, because it has no public sanction, and that is why you can not enforce it. It is an attempt to enforce something that is unenforceable.

I remember in the early days when we had this question before us, Wayne B. Wheeler and others said that it was going to reduce crime, that we could empty the jails. But we get no peep of that sort now from the Anti-Saloon League and its cohorts, because crime has increased since prohibition. We are making prisoners faster than we can make jails to harbor them.

We have passed bills in this House increasing the number of Federal prisons all during the time of prohibition, and many States have been compelled to increase their penal institutions. Crime, instead of decreasing, has increased. There is a crime commission appointed in well-nigh every State to study methods to bring about a curtailment of crime. In England, where there is no prohibition, several jails and prisons have been closed for lack of business. What a different story to tell in this country.

Prohibition is called a noble experiment. I ask you this, What right has an experiment in the Constitution? The Constitution is the place to embed well-tried, age-worn doctrines, fundamental principles, sound and enduring theories of government; but what right has an experiment in the Constitution?

I am opposed to prohibition because of its besetting sins. It has brought in its train evils far worse than the very vice it sought to cure. It has brought the informers, the snoopers, the undercover men; and what about the use of school children as spies, college girls and boys as stool pigeons? What about the legal recognition of bootleggers by taking an income tax from them? What about the "dirty business" of wire tapping? The famous wire-tapping case is Olmsted v. United States (277 U. S. 438). The brief minority opinion of Justice Holmes is often quoted, but there is also a fine minority opinion of Justice Brandeis. He, too, vigorously opposed wire tapping, and, among other things, he said:

"We must never forget," said Mr. Chief Justice Marshall, in McCulloch v. Maryland (4 Wheat. 316, 407), "that it is a constitution we are expounding." Since then this court has repeatedly sustained the exercise of power by Congress under various clauses of that instrument over objects of which the fathers could not have dreamed. * * * Time works changes, brings into existence new conditions and purposes. Therefore a principle to be vital must be capable of wider application than the mischief which gave it birth. * * * In the application of a Constitution, therefore, our contemplation can not be only of what has been but of what may be. * * * Protection against such invasion of "the sanctities of a man's home and the privacies of life" was provided in the fourth and fifth amendments by specific language. But "time works changes, brings into existence new conditions and purposes." Subtler and more far-reaching means of invading privacy have become available to the Government. Discovery and invention have made it possible for the Government, by means far more effective than stretching upon the rack, to obtain disclosure in court of what is whispered in the closet. * * * The progress of science in furnishing the Government with means of espionage is not likely to stop with wire tapping. Ways may some day be developed by which the Government, without removing papers from secret drawers, can reproduce them in court and by which it will be enabled to expose to a jury the most intimate occurrences of the home. * * * As a means of espionage writs of assistance and general warrants are but puny instruments of tyranny and oppression when compared with wire tapping.

Do you wish to place your liberty in the hands of every petty officer, every prohibition agent? I shall vote in favor of the amendment to be offered to-day excluding the use of any money for purposes of wire tapping. No officer can open or tamper with my mail. That would be an invasion of my personal security and privacy. Why should they have the right to tamper or tap or intermeddle with my telephone? When they tap my wire they also interfere with your rights, because they intercept not only my messages but every message that you may care to send to me over the wires. Indeed, the telephone is just as much a part of my home as my room or my private desk, and the agents can not open my desk nor search my room, under the fourth and fifth amendments, without a search warrant. [Applause.]

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, I yield to myself the balance of the time, and I would like to know how much time it is.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Can the gentleman from Alabama give me two minutes more?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I can not; but I will give the gentleman one minute.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman and Members of the committee, you can readily recognize that there is not much one can say in three minutes, even if he has an additional minute.

I want to call the attention of the House to what the gentleman from Oregon has said, that you can not enforce a law which is against the will of the people. You can not enforce a law against the sentiment of the people. If you will look at the Literary Digest, you will find that in some places the sentiment of the people is 10 to 1 against the law. Other places, 5 to 1; other places, 3 to 1. It is demonstrated that the great, overwhelming majority of the people of the United States are against this law.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] announced some time ago that he was going to favor all of the appropriations that were proposed, because he wanted to demonstrate that although you have all the money you need or say you need, you can not enforce this law. That has been easily demonstrated. You have had all the money that you needed, and things are getting "easier" than they ever were. Look at the map of the city of Washington as it is dotted with places where speak-easies exist. It looks as though it had innumerable flyspecks upon it—hundreds of speak-easies. The gentleman from Georgia the other day said that he was in favor of this law, when he knew himself that there are more speak-easies in the State of Georgia than in any other State in the whole Union. All of you gentlemen know that although the saloon has passed away, there are more speak-easies in the country to-day than there were saloons at any time. The drink bill of this country is $28,000,000,000, whereas in years gone by it did not assume any such amount.

All kinds of speeches are made. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. RAGON] said that the Immigration Bureau had not been cut down. I find that, according to the report filed hereon, it has been cut down $14,700,000. He said the antitrust enforcement had not been cut down. I find that it has been cut $10,300,000. Of the 82 items, there is not one that has not been cut except that for the enforcement of prohibition. I am not complaining, because I know that if we gave you all the money in the Union, unless we could stop the fermentation of grapes, unless we could stop the fermentation of rye and corn, you could not enforce prohibition. It is a matter which nature is going to take care of and which you can not stop.

As I say, you can not enforce a law which is against the sentiment and will of the people. Since January, 1920, to July 30, 1931, in your endeavor to do so, you have arrested nearly 700,000 people; you have convicted 500,000; you have seized liquor, mash, and so forth, to the extent of over 266,000,000 gallons; collected fines of $60,000,000; and seized property of $231,000,000.

You have employed and employed men to enforce the law until you have dropped from the service over 12,000, because they were unfit or because they themselves had violated the law. It is a great travesty upon justice this prohibition amendment and Volstead Act.

We are now suffering from a deficit of more than two billions, and yet we have expended in that time three hundred and seventy millions for enforcement, have lost revenue of $10,984,000,000, and yet the drink bill of the country is over twenty-eight billions of dollars. That is not the worst of it. It has debased the morals of our people and made hypocrites of many of the best of society. No one regards this law as they do other statutes. No one blames others for drinking; to get good liquor has become a game in which all are interested except a very small number.

I am as strongly opposed to saloons returning as any man, and would not have them come back for any consideration; if I thought they could come back, I should sooner renounce my opposition to prohibition, but I know the American people will never allow them to appear again. The Anti-Saloon League was organized to eliminate saloons. They have done so. Why can not they help us out by the passage of proper legislation, help us eliminate speak-easies, which are far worse.

On Thursday of this week we shall offer an opportunity for those opposed to the eighteenth amendment to sign a petition to discharge the Judiciary Committee. I sincerely trust we shall have enough people interested in bringing our country back to its senses to sign this petition. This is not a war for a day nor for a year; it is a war until the American people, through their own efforts, can throw off the shackles of fanaticism and regain their liberties assured them under the Constitution of the United States.

We do not seek to violate the Constitution but do seek to so amend it that it will not be violated as it is to-day. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Maryland has expired.

Mr. BECK. Mr. Chairman, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CLANCY].

Mr. CLANCY. Mr. Chairman, I rise merely for the purpose of referring to the attitude of my colleague from Michigan [Mr. KETCHAM]. He attempted to severely tongue lash the wets of the House to-day, and particularly our eminent constitutional lawyer and leader, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BECK]. The gentleman from Michigan has been badly worried lately by the fact that many of the Michigan delegation in the House seem to be going wet. Nine or ten out of the thirteen Members from Michigan may vote for a referendum or resubmission of the eighteenth amendment. Probably the gentleman is also much shaken and is made almost hysterical by the disappearance from this body of two of the great Anti-Saloon League leaders on the Republican side, Mr. Hudson and Mr. Cramton, both from Michigan, who formerly lectured us wets vehemently on our prohibition stand, and who were defeated mainly because of their scoldings. Gentlemen excitedly quoted the Constitution to us wets and presumed to tell us what our oaths of office are, but I have always found it a sufficient answer to this gentleman and to others of the 100 per cent dry type to ask them if they are in favor of the enforcement of the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments, and particularly of that clause of the Constitution which orders a reapportionment. I have found that because the wets gain by this enforcement most drys oppose reapportionment.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. BECK. Mr. Chairman, I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD].

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, the will of the people is the law of the land. That is a political axiom that reflects the hope of democracies. State after State has been passing, by referendum votes, laws to forbid State enforcement of prohibition. District after district, in recent congressional elections, has been turning out drys as Members of this House, and supplanting them with wets. I challenge any dry to cite one instance in the history of recent congressional elections, where the issue was wet and dry, where the wet was defeated and the dry was successful. Take the sixth, the seventh, and the eighth districts of Michigan. They all went wet—and the sixth district was represented in this House by Mr. Louis Cramton, the official voice of the Anti-Saloon League on this floor in the last Congress. Every one of those dry Members has been superseded by a wet. I ask the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. RAGON] whether he will say that the people of the first New Hampshire district belied their high purpose in expressing their will at the election by electing that distinguished Democrat, Mr. ROGERS, on the main issue of wet over dry? Have not the people of this country a right in this controversy to express their views?

Oh, it is easy for you dry apologists to appeal to the superintendents of schools who are here from dry districts, but if the superintendents of schools from wet industrial districts are sincere they will recall that to-day students are carrying flasks and are entering into illegitimate trade in the purchase of gin, which was not the case in any instance when you and I went to high school, long before the days of prohibition. The youth of the land is being debauched by this unenforceable law. It is not the illicit-liquor interests that are changing the complexion of this House. It ill becomes a Democrat to chide an electorate for turning out a dry Republican and putting in a wet Democrat, thus condemning the will of the people on that issue.

The liberals of this House, both Republican and Democratic, will presently submit to you, through the discharge rule, an amendment that will recognize the dry sentiment where it is dry and the wet sentiment where it is wet, and shortly after a modification bill permitting the manufacture and sale of 2¾ per cent beer, that will recognize also the same principle of State rights and local option.

The time is here when the people will no longer tolerate the present intolerable conditions. They demand immediate rectification of the evils consequent on the unregulated liquor traffic. The people will have their way regardless of constitutional impediments.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I value the friendship and respect the views of my colleagues on both sides of the aisle who entertain very different opinions as to the prohibition law from those held by me. I will purposely avoid discussing matters to which allusions have been made and which are not pertinent to the issue now before the House. I am always willing, when time permits, to discuss pertinent issues very frankly with my friends, but when we come to consider an appropriation item for law enforcement I think the discussion should be confined to those matters that are pertinent thereto. Is this law being well administered; are the funds appropriated being efficiently expended? These are pertinent inquiries.

What are the results of the efforts of the officers charged with the administration of this appropriation. Do they show progress? I say to you that no man can read the hearings on this bill and not be satisfied, first, that there is a capable man at the head of this service; that he is seeking to enforce it impartially and fairly in every way and in every section. He seeks only to discharge honestly and fearlessly the high duties devolving on him in his important official position. [Applause.] He is doing it, my friends, in a decent way. Nothing perhaps could illustrate it more clearly than a letter recently written to his agents. I speak, of course, of Mr. Woodcock. This is a letter which he wrote to his agents after there had been some just criticism called to his attention with reference to the employment of women to purchase liquor. Said he:

> The use of any Federal funds to pay women for services in the purchase of liquor, directly or indirectly, is forbidden.
> No Federal funds will be used, directly or indirectly, to purchase liquor for women.
>
> Agents when seeking to purchase liquor for use as evidence will not be accompanied by women.
> This order should not be taken as a check upon initiative. It is issued to prevent abuses that have brought discredit upon the bureau and trouble to individual agents in the past. Intelligent effort upon a higher plane is bound to produce better results in the long run. I do not believe there is any problem in enforcement which you can not solve within these restrictions. If there is such a problem, bring it to my attention by letter.
> I ask your cheerful and hearty compliance with the letter and spirit of this order.

That is indicative of the decent way the law is being administered.

Some reference has been made to the fact that in the gallery may be many leaders of the youth of our land. I want them to carry back to their homes this message: Carry to the youth of the land that this law is being enforced. [Applause.] Its enforcement is progressing steadily and better in every section of the country, and this year you will see, my friends, an educational campaign inaugurated that will arouse the patriotism and the love of both old and young for this country of ours as never before, and there will be evidenced a higher type of loyalty to the flag and to the Constitution than we have witnessed in many years. [Applause.]

I say to my learned friend from Pennsylvania, whom I greatly respect and admire, that he is wrong in concluding that this law can not be enforced. Why do I say the gentleman is wrong? Doubt is not a student, and he is. Doubt is not a dreamer, and he is. Doubt is not a worker, yet he is. Doubt is not a builder. I hope he will prove to be. [Applause.] Doubt is the first cousin of ignorance, and is the deadly enemy of knowledge and of faith and of courage, and I acquit him of ignorance. [Applause.]

My friends, I was surprised to find that not a speaker who spoke for what we term the wet cause had read the hearings, because they are men who would not intentionally misquote the record, and their failure to read the record, to read the report, led to inaccuracies in some of their statements, like my friend, the gentleman from Maryland, who made bold to declare that we had reduced all law enforcement measures but one, namely, the prohibition amendment. We made no reduction in the antitrust appropriation, as recommended by the Budget, even though it appeared there would be an unexpended balance at the end of the year of from twenty to thirty thousand dollars. We made no reduction in the enforcement of the immigration law, and yet were told that at the end of the present fiscal year there would be an unexpended balance of $60,000 or more. The committee felt that here were three outstanding laws—prohibition, antitrust, and immigration—and even though there might be some few who did not want to see these laws enforced and might favor no appropriation whatever therefor, yet the people of America, my friends, we knew stood for the enforcement of all three of those laws. [Applause.]

Your committee was but voicing the sentiment of America in carrying full funds for the enforcement of these laws. It is my belief they will be efficiently enforced.

I have no desire to discuss in making appropriations for the enforcement of the prohibition law questions as to whether prohibition is right or wrong. There may be—yes, will be, I assume—a proper time to discuss that, and I trust it can be discussed without the loss or estrangement of friendships. It should be discussed on a dignified plane in such way as to carry a real constructive message to the 120,000,000 people whom we represent. Appeals to prejudice and hate win no arguments. It is only when you rise above selfishness, above greed, above appetite, above the hope of reward or the fear of punishment that you find the road to the human soul. [Applause.]

I hope that that will be the character of arguments we may later hear from distinguished Members of the House on both sides of the aisle in reference to all controversial questions that lay at the base of law enforcement. [Applause.]

Mr. CONNERY. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

All time has expired.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, I am informed that a bill prohibiting wire tapping has been introduced by my colleague the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. SCHAFER].

The CHAIRMAN. All time has expired. The bill is open for amendment.

Mr. BOYLAN. Mr. Chairman, I have offered an amendment, which has been read for information.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. BOYLAN] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk again reported the Boylan amendment.

Mr. BOYLAN. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BOYLAN. As I have offered this amendment, I believe I am entitled to five minutes in support of it?

The CHAIRMAN. All debate on this section and all amendments thereto was closed by unanimous agreement in the House.

Mr. BOYLAN. This is the only amendment pending, and I think I should explain the amendment to the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BLANTON) there were—ayes 74, noes 133.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SCHAFER: On page 38, in line 3, after the word "Columbia," strike out the period, insert a colon, and add the following: "Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be used for the tapping of telephone or telegraph wires."

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the amendment that it is not germane to the section of the bill to which it is offered.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Chairman, it is merely a limitation.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Alabama desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. BANKHEAD. No.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. MCREYNOLDS). The Chair holds that the amendment is a limitation and is in order. Therefore the point of order is overruled. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. SCHAFER) there were—ayes 95, noes 137.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chair appointed as tellers Mr. SCHAFER and Mr. OLIVER of Alabama.

The committee again divided, and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 103, noes 132.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. TIERNEY. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. TIERNEY: On page 38, line 3, strike out the period, insert a colon, and add the following: "Provided, That no moneys appropriated in this act for the enforcement of the prohibition amendment shall be expended in any State the legislature of which declines to directly appropriate a sum equal to the amount appropriated of the Federal appropriation estimated to be expended in said State for the enforcement of the prohibition amendment and laws applicable thereto."

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the amendment is not germane either to the section to which it is offered or to the bill. It is legislation on an appropriation bill not authorized by law and is a change of existing law.

Mr. TIERNEY. Mr. Chairman, I believe my amendment is a limitation of the appropriation bill. I believe it falls into the category of the amendment that was placed on the Army appropriation bill of last year, which provided that no money should be expended for Army purchases unless the goods were made in America. I think it also comes within the precedent created in connection with the act for public roads of this year, which provided that no Federal money should be spent on Federal roads in any State of the Union which uses convict labor. I think they are two good precedents for the support of this amendment, and I think the amendment is a limitation of an appropriation and not legislation so called.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, this same amendment was offered to a previous appropriation bill. I offered it, and at that time a point of order was raised but it was overruled.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, this amendment interferes with the discretion of the executive power that expends this appropriation. It requires the executive to go out and gain information, which is always improper, with respect to limitations. It will require the eliciting of information as to what legislatures have done in every State, and in that way it interferes with the executive power.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. The Chair holds that the point of order is not well taken; that the amendment is germane and is a limitation. Therefore the Chair overrules the point of order.

The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Connecticut.

Mr. TIERNEY. Mr. Chairman, this amendment refers to and is a limitation on the proposed $11,000,000 appropriation to the Department of Justice for prohibition enforcement, which, by the way, is the only one of the administration's appropriation bills that has not been cut in the interests of savings and helping the poor.

In view of the Wickersham-report information and what seems to me to be the strong sentiment of the country at large against prohibition enforcement, I think we are just about throwing away $11,000,000 of taxpayers' money if we vote this appropriation.

However, if the majority of the House vote for it, I will not be one of them. Let us apply such enforcement as we pretend to have only to such States who will meet the Government's portion of the appropriation allocated to such States by a like amount from their own coffers duly voted by their legislatures.

If a State does not want to pay, either because they do not believe in liquor enforcement by the Government or because they do not want to stand their fair share of this alleged protection, then, on the old doctrine of State rights, they do not obtain enforcement through the channels of that rare type of public official known as prohibition director and enforcement agent.

May I state that as far as my own State of Connecticut is concerned there is little likelihood of our legislature voting any such funds. We have never approved the eighteenth amendment and by a very large majority we look forward to the day when we can vote to wipe it off the statute books.

Mr. Chairman, I like the views of Matthew Woll, chairman of our 2,000,000 Federation of Labor modification group.

That Congress, in the adoption of prohibition, or the Volstead Act, indicated by the language used the belief that the question is one where the Nation and the States would use concurrent power in the enforcement of the law.

That if that be true, then the States of the Union, especially those States the Senators and Representatives of which in Congress believe in the continued attempt to enforce this law, which every fair-minded American must admit has been proven after 12 years of bitter experience to be unenforceable, should not appropriate any more of the American taxpayers' money unless their own States indicated their interest in the continuance of this law by the States themselves appropriating public funds to attempt at least to enforce this unenforceable law.

We understand that of late years there are 31 States represented in the Senate by 32 of the 47 Democratic Members and 29 of the 48 Republican Members, in addition to the 1 representative of the Farmer-Labor Party, and 148 of the 212 Republican Members of the House and 140 of the Democratic Members of the House, in addition to the 1 Farmer-Labor Member, which 31 States do not appropriate any money for the enforcement of this hishonest law.

This being true, should the Congress of the United States, in these days when economy is supposedly the watchword, appropriate any more funds to be spent in those States wherein the State legislatures, who are real close to the wishes and the wants of the people, refuse to appropriate any of their taxpayers' money to enforce this law?

Incidentally it might be well to call attention to the fact that in 31 States, according to the tabulation of votes as shown on page 241 of the Congressional Directory issued December, 1931, a total of more than 17,000,000 American citizens exercised their suffrage rights. This vote in the majority of cases refers to the votes cast in what is termed "an off year."

The total vote cast in the last national election was 36,724,823.

The following-named constitute the 31 States I have referred to which either do not or will not contribute to Federal enforcement directly: Arizona, Arkansas, California, Connecticut, Delaware, Florida, Georgia, Illinois, Iowa, Kentucky, Louisiana, Maine, Maryland, Mississippi, Minnesota, New Jersey, New York, North Carolina, North Dakota, Oklahoma, Pennsylvania, Wyoming, Massachusetts, Missouri, Montana, Nebraska, Nevada, Rhode Island, South Dakota, Utah, Wisconsin.

This amendment, if carried, would settle the whole enforcement question and restore to the States their full constitutional rights.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. TIERNEY) there were—ayes 79, noes 176.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. FINLEY: Strike out the period after the word "Columbia" in line 3, insert a colon and the following words: "No plan for, or method of, obtaining evidence against violators of the prohibition laws shall be put in force or followed by the Department of Justice unless and until approved by a convention of bootleggers and moonshiners."

[Laughter.]

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the amendment is special legislation, as more applicable to the gentleman's district than any other district in the country, and the further point of order that it is legislation on an appropriation bill.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment is withdrawn.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

To enable the Secretary of Labor to foster, promote, and develop the welfare of the wage earners of the United States, including juniors legally employed, to improve their working conditions, to advance their opportunities for profitable employment by regularly collecting, furnishing, and publishing employment information as to opportunities for employment; maintaining a system for clearing labor between the several States; cooperating with the Veterans' Administration to secure employment for veterans; cooperating with and coordinating the public employment offices throughout the country, including personal services in the District of Columbia and elsewhere; traveling expenses, including expenses of attendance at meetings concerned with the work of the Employment Service when specifically authorized by the Secretary of Labor; supplies and equipment, telegraph and telephone service, and miscellaneous expenses, $802,500; of which amount not to exceed $54,930 may be expended for personal services in the District of Columbia: Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be expended for the establishment or maintenance of any employment office unless suitable space therefor is furnished free of rent by State, county, or local authority, or by individuals or organizations: Provided further, That no part of this appropriation shall be used to pay any salary in any field employment office at an annual rate in excess of $2,000.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the agreement entered into in the House, debate on this paragraph is limited to one hour, one-half to be controlled by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OLIVER] and one-half to be controlled by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SHREVE].

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. OLIVER of Alabama: On page 122, line 1, after the word "by," insert the word "Federal."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I offer another amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. OLIVER of Alabama: On page 121, line 21, strike out "$802,500" and insert in lieu thereof "$383,780."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CONNERY].

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, I have three amendments which I ask the Clerk to report.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will report the amendments for information.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CONNERY: Page 121, line 21, after the word "expenses," strike out "$802,500" and insert in lieu thereof "$820,000."

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama reserves a point of order on the amendment when offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, may I have the other two amendments reported?

The Clerk read as follows:

Second amendment offered by Mr. CONNERY: Page 121, line 23, after the word "Columbia," strike out all of lines 23, 24, and 25, and on page 122, strike out all of line 1 and in line 2 the words "by individuals, or organizations."

Third amendment offered by Mr. CONNERY: Page 122, line 2, after the word "organizations," strike out all of lines 2, 3, 4, and 5.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, there was so much confusion in the Chamber that we could not hear. Did the gentleman from Alabama offer an amendment reducing the amount of $802,500, on page 121, to $383,000?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Well, we did not know what was going on.

Mr. SWING. Would not that make it impossible now to do the very thing that the unanimous consent was given us yesterday to do?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I will ask unanimous consent that the vote by which the amendment which I sent to the desk was adopted be vacated. I understand that a number of the Members were not aware of what the amendment was. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the proceedings by which the amendment was adopted will be vacated.

There was no objection.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, the membership of the House is, I believe, entirely cognizant of what my amendments call for. In the confusion I did not understand the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama, the proceedings in adopting which have just been vacated. The Bureau of the Budget recommended $820,000, and by taking out $17,500 it cuts down the Employment Service. My first amendment restores the appropriation to $820,000.

The second amendment provides for striking out the proviso that "no part of this appropriation shall be expended for the establishment or maintenance of any employment office unless suitable space therefor is furnished free of rent by the State, county, or local authority, or by individuals or organizations."

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The gentleman will see that the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama cuts out $500,000 more.

Mr. CONNERY. Yes; the amendment would cut $500,000 from the $802,000. I hope that amendment will be defeated.

Now, what we want to do is to restore the amount recommended by the Bureau of the Budget. Then we want to strike out the provision demanding that the offices seek free rent, and strike out the provision that no employee in the employment offices shall receive more than $2,000 a year.

This affects every employment office in the United States under the Department of Labor and forbids them paying more than $2,000 for salaries. It affects the 48 States in the Union. Some of these men get $4,000, some between two thousand and four thousand, and it would cut them all down to $2,000.

I could well stop at this time, because I think it is entirely clear to the House what my amendment will do. As I say, we want to put the $17,500 back, and make the sum $820,000, as recommended by the Bureau of the Budget. Secondly, we want to strike out that provision which would make the United States Government act as beggars, asking free rent for a Government office, and third, we want to strike out that provision restricting the salaries to $2,000.

Mr. KVALE. And hardly any of these directors get over $2,400.

Mr. CONNERY. That is true; and this will cut them down $400.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. Yes.

Mr. TABER. Am I to understand that the way this bill stands at the present time it provides a cut in the pay that is now being paid to men who are working in these employment offices?

Mr. CONNERY. Yes.

Mr. TABER. How much of a cut does it provide?

Mr. CONNERY. It cuts anywhere from $400 to $800 or $900 on some salaries and from a thousand to two thousand dollars on other salaries.

Mr. TABER. Does the gentleman think there is a difference between cutting an individual's salary in an individual place and a general cut that will be applied proportionately to everybody?

Mr. CONNERY. This affects every State director.

Mr. TABER. It affects only those under this particular bureau?

Mr. CONNERY. Yes.

Mr. TABER. It does not affect those under the other bureaus?

Mr. CONNERY. No; they did this only to the Department of Labor, but not to the other departments, and that in a time of unemployment. In such a time are we going to cut out the service that will at least help people to get work?

Mr. ARENTZ. And the reason the gentleman is trying to get this provision changed is because he wants these men kept there on the job?

Mr. CONNERY. Yes.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. Yes.

Mr. LANHAM. Personally it seems to me that in this time of unemployment it is unwise to restrict employment agencies. In the present financial and economic condition of the country, are not States and cities and counties less likely to be able to furnish quarters free than heretofore? In addition to that, when so many men are seeking employment agencies, would it not be unwise, where they have been established in centers and long operated, to change the place of operation?

Mr. CONNERY. Yes. In answer to the gentleman's first question, it seems to me it would be unwise to restrict the employment agency. Besides, there are 22 of these offices whose sole duty is to get jobs for unemployed service men, and this is going to cut them down.

Mrs. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. Yes; I yield to my distinguished colleague the lady from Massachusetts.

Mrs. ROGERS. A good many veterans are employed in these offices, are they not?

Mr. CONNERY. I think there are at least 22. I think the director of every veterans' employment service is a veteran.

Mrs. ROGERS. Of course, the work the American Legion is now doing does not in the least take the place of these offices, because these are permanent offices.

Mr. CONNERY. Yes.

Mrs. ROGERS. Whereas the Legion work is temporary, an emergency measure. It is a splendid movement, but fine as it is, legionnaires can not give the necessary time to permanent work of this kind.

Mr. CONNERY. No. And these are permanent offices. I do not desire to take up any further time, because I want to yield to some of my colleagues. I think the membership understands what we are trying to do. We are trying to put back $17,500, recommended by the Bureau of the Budget, and not have the Government go out looking for rent-free places.

I think it is a disgrace to ask the Government to do that. In the next place, we do not want to have cuts in these salaries. The House will remember that I asked the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Appropriations before Christmas, when they brought in this supplementary provision for $120,000 for additional offices, if this cut in the salaries at that time would affect the permanent offices, and he said by no means.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman will remember that last week I put into the RECORD certain places where rent is now being paid?

Mr. CONNERY. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. And the contract in respect to which will expire July 1. There are only a few of those. Does the gentleman think that provision could not be made in those places, in the chambers of commerce or in the Federal building, for rent-free offices?

Mr. CONNERY. I do not think the United States Government, when running an Employment Service, should be running around to mayors and chambers of commerce and asking them to find a rent-free place for it.

Mr. BLANTON. In my own State the offices are furnished free.

Mr. CONNERY. But the Government is running its own Employment Service and ought not to go begging around the States and cities for quarters. If we are as cheap as that, it would be better to abolish the whole thing. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. KELLER].

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Chairman, first I call attention to what the object of this bill really is.

I quote from the bill itself to see what its object is and to ask the committee to consider its own official statement of the object. I quote:

EMPLOYMENT SERVICE

To enable the Secretary of Labor to foster, promote, and develop the welfare of the wage earners of the United States, including juniors legally employed, to improve their working conditions, to advance their opportunities for profitable employment by regularly collecting, furnishing, and publishing employment information as to opportunities for employment; maintaining a system for clearing labor between the several States; cooperating with the Veterans' Administration to secure employment for veterans.

Yet the chairman of this committee, and this committee, come here and ask that we take all the power away from the Secretary of Labor to carry out the very object of the bill which they have themselves brought in. There are 8,000,000 idle men in America, and this Congress so far has not turned its hand to help these idle men. How can we answer, as we will be compelled to, when we go out and face the voters in our districts when they put the question to us? We had better be able to answer. I do not mean that as a threat, but as an inspiration and appeal to humanity that we give the idle men of America a chance to get work, to get employment, to do something, to serve, and no longer to starve.

I am not able to understand how the chairman of this committee, or any member of it, could stand for such an amendment as the chairman has offered to this bill, much less one that he will propose later on, to cut half a million dollars from the appropriation, because if that is done, it would completely and entirely nullify the very object that is declared for this bill.

Eight million men are standing out in the open asking for jobs, and yet we come here attempting to save $17,500 by the amendment under consideration, to keep them from getting jobs. We can not answer a man that is idle by denying him the only opportunity now in reach. I warn you now that 8,000,000 idle men in America are not going to remain idle, and it is the duty of this Congress to see that they do not remain idle. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks, and to insert some excerpts to which I wish to refer.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I have asked the privilege of extending my remarks in the RECORD, and to insert in connection therewith excerpts from evidence brought before our subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations, presided over by our distinguished colleague from Missouri [Mr. CANNON], to show just how the rights of the people are handled by the Public Utilities Commission of the District of Columbia.

On January 6, 1932, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] passed in the House of Representatives without a single vote against it the following resolution:

[House Resolution 90, Seventy-second Congress, first session]

In the House of Representatives, January 6, 1932. Mr. BYRNS submitted the following resolution; which was agreed to.

Resolution

Resolved, That it is the sense of the House of Representatives, unanimously expressed, that Commissioner Patrick, of the Public Utilities Commission, should rescind immediately his order requiring taxicabs in the District of Columbia to be placed upon a meter basis, it being the intention that visitors coming to the Nation's Capital during 1932 shall have taxicab service at the very lowest rate possible.

The passage of the above Resolution No. 90 by the House of Representatives appears on page 1398 of the daily CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for January 6, 1932. It was passed unanimously. It would be well for Gen. Mason M. Patrick, chairman of the Public Utilities Commission of the District of Columbia, to familiarize himself with the expressions voiced from the floor by different Members against the order, which without rhyme or reason, he has attempted to put into effect, to run all independent taxicabs in Washington out of business by establishing meters. Everyone knows that the organized taxicab monopolies here are behind this proposed meter proposition for two purposes, the first to destroy all competition, and the second to rob and mulct the public with charges of 90 cents to $1.50 for the same service independents are now rendering for 20 cents. He will find some of these expressions on pages 1386 and 1387 of the RECORD for said January 6, 1932.

When General Patrick was before our committee the other day he admitted that not a Member of Congress had attended his so-called hearing, and that few citizens, who are busy daily about their business, had been heard. He attempted to support his order attempting to require meters by claiming that hundreds of independent taxi drivers, wholly disconnected with the "Whites and Blacks," the "Yellows," the "Diamonds," and other monopolies, had filed with him their indorsement of requiring meters. When we pinned him down for their names and addresses the following list is that which he filed with our committee, and I am informed that this list is propaganda, pure and simple, and that most of the names on this list are not independent taxi drivers wholly disconnected from said monopolies. That the real independents may know just how their interests have been propagandized before the Public Utilities Commission, I am giving these names and addresses herewith, to wit:

Mr. Chairman, it does not mean so much to General Patrick whether there is a 20-cent taxi rate or whether the monopolies may charge the people 90 cents to $1.50 under meters for the same service. He is paid $7,500 salary as chairman of the Public Utilities Commission and, in addition, he receives retirement pay of $6,000 per annum as a retired general, and he is permitted to buy everything carried from Army stores at Government cost, and he is furnished free an automobile, and he is also furnished a chauffeur paid for by the Government.

But as little as it means to General Patrick, it does mean everything to the 500,000 people living in Washington, and to the hundreds of thousands of our constituents who are to visit Washington this year, and whom we are not going to permit to be robbed by heartless taxicab monopolies. I would like for each one of the drivers whose names are given above who are not in favor of meters to advise my office in writing, and whether or not he is an ex-service man, and what is his average daily net income.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I understand we are now proceeding under unanimous consent for one hour, and it was my understanding that one-half the time should be controlled by those opposed to the present provision and one-half to those in favor of the bill.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I think it would be better for me to make a statement about this at this time, and I will yield five minutes to myself.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. BANKHEAD). Permit the Chair to make a statement. As the present occupant of the chair understood the unanimous-consent agreement, it was that there should be one hour debate upon this section, one-half to be controlled by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OLIVER] and one-half to be controlled by the ranking minority member of the committee, with the understanding that the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OLIVER] should yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts control of 15 minutes of the one-half hour.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. And the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SHREVE] would yield 15 minutes of his time to some one on that side who might be opposed to the recommendation of the committee.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The statement made by the gentleman from Alabama is satisfactory if we can have it carried out.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, this is a far-reaching amendment, and I want the House to understand that your subcommittee was perfectly frank and fair in presenting it for your determination. In the report it was stated that while it was felt that reductions could be here made, yet in view of the fact that the House just before the holiday voted an additional $120,000 for this service, the committee did not feel justified in taking any action of its own accord, but felt that the matter should be simply reported by way of suggestion to the House so that the House might feel free to exercise its own judgment without reference to any action by the committee. In other words, you are the sovereigns. Your committee wishes only to suggest how, in its judgment, you can provide for a substantial saving without real hurt to this service. If I felt you were accomplishing with the appropriation what my good friend from Massachusetts [Mr. CONNERY] feels is being accomplished with it, I would not vote for reduction nor for a single additional limitation.

The appropriation that was recommended by the Bureau of the Budget was approximately $820,000. We have not reduced that. We have brought it back for you to determine whether it should be reduced. We imposed upon that appropriation two conditions.

Mr. CONNERY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I yield.

Mr. CONNERY. The gentleman's committee did reduce it from $820,000 to $802,000.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. That was only because of the rent limitation which I will now mention. We reduced it some seventeen thousand-odd dollars because of the attached proviso that there should be no rent paid after July 1 next. The rent now being paid is about $17,000, which was deducted from the Budget estimate.

Then we provided a further limitation, that after July 1 no salary should be paid in excess of $2,000. The reason we put those limitations on was that we felt we were justified from the action taken in the House just before the holidays. You established 54 offices with the $120,000 carried in the deficiency bill, and in authorizing those offices to be established you provided that no rent should be paid at a single office and no salary in excess of $2,000 should be paid at any of the 54 offices. The position of the committee was that if the House denied to the 54 offices, authorized to be established between December 27 and July 1, 1932, any rentals, and limited the maximum salary to $2,000, that might be paid to any office manager, the committee was doing no violence to the attitude of the House by suggesting like limitations after July 1 next. The limitation you placed, it is proper to say, did not limit the salaries prior to that time, but only salaries at the new offices to be established under the $120,000 appropriation.

Mr. LEAVITT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I yield.

Mr. LEAVITT. Does the gentleman recall that when the temporary bill, to which the gentleman has referred, was before the House, containing this $2,000 limitation, I offered an amendment to strike out that limitation, and the gentleman said at that time, as I recall, that that had to do only with the temporary matter?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I have just stated that to the House.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. LEAVITT. But that could not be considered then as establishing a precedent by the House?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mrs. ROGERS. Is there not a difference? In the first place, the temporary offices come under the new provision.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I recognize that the lady feels that there is a difference, but I will later suggest reasons for your consideration as to whether the reasons are sound.

Mrs. ROGERS. You are wiping out existing offices—offices that have been in existence for several years.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. The lady is probably correct in her statement.

Mrs. ROGERS. And I think it is unfair to do that, particularly in these times.

Mr. HOPKINS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Yes.

Mr. HOPKINS. Should this $500,000 reduction be made, how many employment offices now in existence would have to be cut out?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. It is very probable none will be cut out unless the appropriation is reduced.

Mr. HOPKINS. The gentleman has offered an amendment to reduce the amount by $500,000.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I reduce it to the amount carried in the regular appropriation bill for the present fiscal year.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. SHREVE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA].

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself two minutes for the present. I want to call the attention of the committee to the parliamentary situation. First, we have the bill before us calling for an appropriation of $802,500. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CONNERY] gave notice to the committee that he would move to raise this amount to $820,000, the amount recommended by the Bureau of the Budget on the estimates of the Secretary of Labor. Now, much to our surprise, there is an amendment pending offered by the distinguished gentleman from Alabama reducing the $802,000 to a little over $300,000. So let us not be confused. We have, first, the proposition of the chairman of the committee itself reducing the amount recommended by the Appropriations Committee. I am sure that all Members of the committee are not in accord with that. Let me say that the Committee on Appropriations had already reduced the amount recommended by the Bureau of the Budget. I want to clarify the situation, because the amendment was offered at a time when everybody was going out of the Chamber and excited about the prohibition debate. The gentleman from Alabama, always fair, moved to rescind that vote, so the amendment is now pending.

Now, Mr. Chairman, we all must know that in these times of stress private employment agencies are exploiting the misery of the unemployed. Not only are exorbitant fees demanded but private employment agencies are the means of unduly reducing wages. The private employment agency secures the good will of employers by constantly offering new workers for less wages. The agency profits come from fees collected. The employee and not the employers pay the fee. The United States Department of Labor is endeavoring to establish a permanen Employment Service throughout the United States. It will take time, of course, to perfect such an organization. Good, active, competent, and conscientious men and women are required for this service. The department should not be limited at this time by a further reduction of appropriations. It is manifestly unfair to reduce salaries in this service. I will reserve the balance of my time and I sincerely hope the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OLIVER] will reconsider the matter and withdraw his amendment.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. KVALE].

Mr. KVALE. Mr. Chairman, in line with the argument developed by the gentleman from New York, these are times of stress. We need this Employment Service more than ever before. A few minutes ago we acted favorably upon a proposal to hold the appropriation for the Prohibition Bureau to the amount of the Budget recommendation. I supported that motion. It seems to me the least we can do in this instance is to hold these employment figures to this same level, and everyone who supported the former proposal should support this amendment.

Now, here you have two groups of men, the directors of this Employment Service and managers of the veterans' employment service. They are not only clerical employees, they do not only receive applications for employment, but they are also responsible for the more important work of the finding of jobs for these desperate men. They have got to go out and cooperate with industrial employment managers; they must go out and cooperate with employers themselves; they have to speak to Lions Clubs, Kiwanis Clubs, and other social, civic, and luncheon clubs; they must necessarily give their positions a consecration and devotion which certainly can not be measured in the terms of the salaries they receive, and we can not expect these men to continue the unselfish work they are doing if we cripple those agencies in the way it is proposed to do.

Mr. SHREVE. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. THATCHER].

Mr. THATCHER. Mr. Chairman, I very much dislike to disagree with the subcommittee on these items, and as a member of the Appropriations Committee I feel a good deal of diffidence in interposing any objection to the program which they have proposed. I commend them for the admirable work they have done on this bill, but I do believe that these items of authorized expenditure, under the conditions which obtain in the country, ought to be preserved and that these provisos should be stricken out.

I fail to understand why in all the lines of employment under the Labor Bureau and the other departments embraced by this bill, this particular branch of the service is singled out for the paring knife.

I want to emphasize what has been said in regard to this subject, that if there is any branch of the service of the Government that ought to be maintained to its full capacity at this time, it is that of this Employment Service. You can not get the type of men to carry on this work, in my judgment, if you restrict them to mere clerk's salaries. It will be money wasted to make the arbitrary restrictions proposed by the subcommittee, and I for one would rather strike the whole item out of the appropriation bill than to carry on this work in a crippled and haphazard way. For that reason I favor the amendments offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts. [Applause.]

Mr. SHREVE. Mr. Chairman, I feel it my duty at this time to say a word. We must remember that this committee has handled the appropriations for the Department of Labor for the last 10 or 12 years. We started in a very small way, and we have gone on until last year we increased their appropriations about $1,000,000.

I feel this committee is competent to judge their needs and requirements, inasmuch as not a single representative of the Department of Labor has been to see me or said a word about it to any member of the committee that I had the honor of being chairman of so long. They are perfectly satisfied, so far as I know, with the bill as it is, and I say the bill should remain intact and should go out of this House just as we brought it in. This means there should not be any increases and there should not be any reductions.

As far as the salaries are concerned, you must remember that salaries are being reduced all over the United States in various ways in every manufacturing plant, and $2,000 is a very fair salary, and so far as I know there has been no complaint to me or to any other member of the committee regarding it.

Mr. KELLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHREVE. Yes.

Mr. KELLER. I would like to know what would have been the gentleman's report if a lot of the men affected had been coming before his committee and asking that this be not disturbed. What report would the gentleman then have made?

Mr. SHREVE. We had the Department of Labor before our committee for a week.

Mr. KELLER. And the gentleman found nobody asking more than they are getting here?

Mr. SHREVE. We found in some cases they wanted more money, but we came to this agreement.

Mr. KELLER. Who came to the agreement?

Mr. SHREVE. The committee.

Mr. KELLER. Yes; the gentleman's committee.

Mr. SHREVE. Yes; we have handled this job long enough to know something about it, I may say to the gentleman.

Mr. KELLER. I hope the gentleman does.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHREVE. I yield.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. In order that the House may have an absolutely fair opportunity of voting on the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CONNERY], I may say that I shall withdraw the amendment seeking to decrease the amount.

Mr. SHREVE. That is certainly fair.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Then there can be no misunderstanding.

Mr. CONNERY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHREVE. Yes.

Mr. CONNERY. The gentleman speaks about the $2,000 salary. We did not do that on any other appropriation bill. We just picked out the Department of Labor to put in that proviso.

Mr. SHREVE. This is a new proposition.

Mr. CONNERY. What is good for one department should be good for another.

Mr. SHREVE. The gentleman will recall that last year I went to the Director of the Budget and got an increase recommended to take care of this Department of Labor.

Mr. KELLER. How many idle men did we have last year?

Mr. SHREVE. We had about as many as we have now.

Mr. KELLER. I understand the increase to be two or three million.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHREVE. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. May I suggest to the chairman of the subcommittee that he limit the $2,000 to all except State directors?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. The gentleman means one State director in each State?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes; and exclude those positions of State directors from the $2,000 provision. Then State directors may draw over $2,000 after July 1. I understand, then, the gentleman from New York will go along with the committee?

The CHAIRMAN. May the Chair address an inquiry to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OLIVER]? In the confusion the Chair could not hear what the gentleman stated. Does the Chair understand the gentleman wishes to withdraw the amendment which he offered and which is now pending at the Clerk's desk?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. The amendment reducing the amount of the appropriation.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman desire to submit that request at this time?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Yes; I make that request, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that the pending amendment proposed by him be withdrawn. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SHREVE. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON], former chairman of the Committee on Immigration.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I am pleased to learn that an adjustment is taking place in the Committee of the Whole House by which nearly everyone will be satisfied. I am glad that the hard-working gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OLIVER] proposes to withdraw his principal amendment that would still further reduce this item. In the meantime, I believe that an amendment by which the State directors may continue to have the pay of an executive director will be fair, and that it will be accepted.

I want to go along as far as possible with all these committees in an effort to reduce Federal expenditures, but I believe we will all agree that it is a mistake to make a key point of reduction of appropriations for the Department of Labor at one of the smallest and weakest places.

When we get back to our various districts this summer and fall Members from all parts of the country are going to be met with the charge of Federal extravagance and with a tremendous demand that all bureaus and all Federal departments be reduced and curtailed. Well, how did they happen to grow so large? Why this ever-increasing Federal activity? Why, the answer is that the income-tax system paved the way. All Congresses since the income-tax enactment have gone along encouraging larger and larger Federal activities and the necessary appropriations to make the activities function. How would the bills be paid? Why, by the income tax. And now we suddenly find that there is not so much left in that pot of gold at the rainbow's end; in fact, we find a shortage, a deficit of nearly four billions of dollars, and painfully we realize that every billion is one thousand million.

This is one of the problems you are going to have to discuss when you get home, but in the general discussion, inasmuch as we are trying to assist business to recover, I think it would be poor policy to try to trim a few thousand dollars at the very point of contact for unemployed labor, a large number of whom are itinerants, depending on these agencies which we have heretofore set up.

Mr. KVALE. Will not the gentleman then try to prevail upon the chairman and the committee to accept the increase of $18,000, yield on this point, as it is late in the afternoon? Few Members are present, and I say frankly that more should be here unless this is done.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes. I think that will be done. Now, a word to the committee. The chairman and the former chairman are hard-working members. This bill deals with appropriations for four great departments, and of all the departments that come before the committee, the Labor Department comes with the cleanest hands asking for the fewest increases. The gentleman from Pennsylvania says they asked an increase of a million dollars for immigration recently, but that was on account of the then new immigration laws, and that increase was met in a large measure by the increased immigration fees.

Mr. TILSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Certainly.

Mr. TILSON. Is it not a fact that, with the withdrawal of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama, there is now only about $17,000 involved, and that this is merely a question of rent? Even as to this it is a question of fact whether it is needed or not. If it is needed, the amount should be in the bill and if it is not needed, it should come out.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I presume that if a city is large enough to have a Federal employment agency, there are enough vacant places, so that the city could give one of these offices free rent.

Mr. CONNERY. That is all right, but why have in the bill a provision that requires the Government to go out and ask for free rent?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Well, every bureau or organization or city that gets Federal aid of any kind never wants to yield a nickel's worth of it.

Mr. CONNERY. There are employment agencies where they could not find a place for an office.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Well, I do not care, but I hope we have not reached the stage where we begin to trim by picking on a chance to even slightly help the great army of the unemployed. [Applause.]

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. SWING].

Mr. SWING. Mr. Chairman, the distinguished gentleman from Washington said that when we went home we would be charged by our constituents with Federal extravagance. If such a charge is made by any person it will be made by some uninformed person who has not read what has been going on in Congress. We have cut deep on every item of every appropriation bill.

But an economy program can be abused as well as used. You can have destructive economy as well as constructive economy.

I am one of those in the House who has advocated since this session began that organized society, of which the Federal Government is a part, should as far as possible help provide jobs for the unemployed; that the Federal Government ought, by expanding the public-building program, to give employment to the unemployed and stimulate flagging business.

We have not been able to get any response to that proposition. Every public-building item has been cut. The Budget has smothered the request of the Treasury Department for $100,000,000 to carry on the public-building program. The appropriation for public roads has been cut. Every item for construction has been cut. The Federal Government has actually contributed to the existing unemployment.

Since we have denied men opportunity to work where we could have offered it by an enlarged Federal construction program, since we ourselves have refused our citizens chances to work by not speeding up jobs which we are going to do anyway in the next five or six years, we should not here cut down an item which is intended to furnish a clearing house for the unemployed, where they may go to seek employment. It is proposed to make a cut in this item below what the Budget has recommended and hamper the Federal employment agency with other provisions. I think the least that Congress can do, the least that the Federal Government can do, if it is not going to expand its building plans, is to furnish a clearing house, a Federal employment service, where the unemployed can be brought into contact with opportunities for work. We ought not to cripple in any way this proposal to continue the Federal Employment Service.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Montana [Mr. LEAVITT].

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Montana [Mr. LEAVITT].

Mr. LEAVITT. Mr. Chairman, I shall approach this subject not only from the standpoint of the emergency in respect to unemployment, which has been so well established in the debate and in our own knowledge of the situation, but also from the standpoint of the value of a permanent service such as existed in fine form during the war period and which was then allowed to go by the board. The importance of it was not recognized for a number of years because we were in a period of such prosperity that there was no great difficulty on the part of laboring men in finding employment. But there is a permanent value to this employment service from the standpoint of the Federal Government.

I am opposed to the proposal which says that these employment offices shall be established nowhere except where through local or State funds quarters shall be furnished. That is one of the mistakes we ought not to make at this time.

During the period of the war one of the tasks assigned to me was the organization and conduct in the State of Montana of a war emergency employment service. I organized and directed 13 offices in various parts of that State to handle men during the period of war emergency, and I discovered something of the value of this kind of service being conducted by the Federal Government. Take the itinerant laborers, for example, two or three million of them, who move back and forth across this country more or less continually, for harvest work and for work in lumber camps, going from place to place, establishing no residence, being entirely at the mercy of what they can find as they go from one community to another. What touch do they have with their Government? Ordinarily the touch they have is that whenever they go into a community they are told by some policeman to move on to the next place. If they are put in jail because they do not move, what do they find?

They look out of the window and they see the Government operating for every other class of people. They see it operating for the protection of our homes, for the protection of our business. They see it operating in every way for the benefit of other people, but for themselves they have had no contact with the Federal Government which has been beneficial to them. Here was a service built up as a result of the war emergency, meant to take care of their problem, which was the problem of employment, under conditions reasonable and fair to them. I saw men who came into the employment offices in the State of Montana as I went from one place to another in my capacity as director, who came in without any pride in themselves or in their appearance, looking for a job. We treated those men well. We had people in charge of those offices who were capable of a conception of the difficulties under which those men lived and who understood the place that that sort of service ought to take in our national life. They saw to it that when those men were placed in employment they were given a square deal. I have seen those same men, who had first come into the office in an unkempt condition, return wearing a necktie, having their hair cut, and taking pride in themselves and in their appearance. They were glad to come into the office of the Government that was operating for their benefit, just as other branches of the Government were operating for the benefit of other people. That service had a marked and valuable effect during the brief period of its existence upon the state of mind of the working people of the country who had to depend upon that kind of service to get a square deal. We now have an opportunity during another emergency to establish that sort of service.

When we do get it established, I appeal to you, let us establish it in such a way that it may continue to render the sort of service it is capable of rendering, putting into the minds of these men a new conception and appreciation of their Government.

I am also opposed to the idea of limiting the salaries to be paid to any of the field men to $2,000. That is not a matter of economy. That is a mere proposition of making it certain that in some of the key places you will not be able to get men who have a proper conception of their duty. There should be no such limitation as that written into this bill. Further, there should be no limitation that there shall be no office except where the rent is given free. I think we should support every amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CONNERY]. [Applause.]

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CONNERY].

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, I merely want to state, before the gentleman from Alabama concludes, that I hope the House will vote for the three amendments which I have offered. I made it clear what they stand for. I hope the House will vote in favor of those three amendments and stop putting these employment offices out of existence, practically, because that is what it will do the way the bill stands now. In other words, bring back the appropriation to $820,000 as the Bureau of the Budget wanted it. Do not make us go around looking for rent-free offices. I ask the membership to vote for these three amendments.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, it is my understanding that an agreement would be reached, and, therefore, I did not want to take the time of the committee.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I have withdrawn my amendment, and I am willing that the bill carry the $820,000. [Applause.] I will insist on the $2,000 limitation as to all except 1 manager in every State and 23 employment managers. I will offer also the rent amendment.

Mr. SCHNEIDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I yield.

Mr. SCHNEIDER. Are there not two directors in some States, one who has charge of veterans' employment?

Mr. KVALE. If the gentleman will permit me; yes. The veterans' employment service managers are paid $2,400. The others are from three to four thousand.

Mr. SCHNEIDER. I just wanted to get that clear.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I have just stated that I thought 1 director in each State and 23 employment-service managers will be excepted from the $2,000 limitation.

Mr. TABER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I yield.

Mr. TABER. How many will that affect in the offices that are now established? How many will it reduce and to what extent?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I would say, perhaps, 40.

Mr. TABER. And where are they located, largely?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I am sorry not to be able to give you that information without examining the tables further, which appear in the hearing.

Mr. TABER. Would it be in the larger centers?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, there seems to be a disagreement as to the policy of this bureau between the gentleman from Massachusetts and the distinguished chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Alabama, in charge of the subcommittee having the bill under consideration. If we are agreed on the amount, I submit in all fairness that it is hardly just at this time to bring in a limitation on salaries in the one bureau of all the departments of the Government.

Permit me to say there are private employment agencies at this time that are exploiting the unemployed. I called the attention of the House several weeks ago to a recent decision of the United States Court for the Southern District of New York, wherein our State law was held unconstitutional. That law compelled a private employment agency to return the fee if employment was not found. Now, just think of that! A man in dire need of employment, with a family in want, applying to an employment agency, with a promise of work, paid a registration and service fee, under duress of necessity and perhaps hunger, only to learn that there is no job available. Under our State law the private agency was compelled to return the fee if no employment was actually provided. That protection under our State law to get that fee back if employment was not furnished is now declared void, and applicants in search of work are at the mercy of such private agencies. That law has now been declared unconstitutional, and unscrupulous private employment agencies thrive on the exploitation of the unemployed. There is great need of a free service furnished by the Government.

We have established Federal employment agencies. Let us provide for them properly. I know it is difficult for the service at this time to find employment when there is no employment, but as we get out of this crisis employment will start, and the offices are now establishing their contact so that men and women can find employment without paying fees.

I submit that in States like New York, where there are one or two branch offices, we can not afford to say that the man in charge of the employment office shall receive no more than $2,000. It may be a good investment to have a man who is big enough to compete with the private employment office in charge of this work in order to protect men and women requiring such service. I hope the gentleman from Alabama will not insist upon his amendment.

At this time, Mr. Chairman, many contractors enjoying the benefits of Government work are attempting to disregard the provisions of the prevailing rate law. It can easily be imagined the pressure of wage reduction to which workers are now subjected. I am quite sure that there are people in this country who are so greedy and selfish as to hope that poverty and need will create such competition in the labor market as to greatly reduce standards of wages and the American standard of living. A good, efficient national employment service is needed in this country more now than ever before.

If the gentleman from Alabama has generously consented to restore the amount to $820,000, I hope he will go the whole way and remove all the unsatisfactory provisions now in the section. [Applause.]

Mr. CONNERY. If the gentleman will permit me, I want to clarify this situation as far as I am concerned. I appreciate the concessions that the gentleman from Alabama is trying to make, but I want to ask this House to vote on these three amendments that I have offered. I can not see any reason why any limitation should be put on the Labor Department that does not apply in the Commerce, Agriculture, Justice, and every other department in this bill and other appropriation bills.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. As to the rent, that is a matter of administration. In many instances it may be possible to find a suitable office in a suitable place. For instance, in New York City we found a place for the main office in the Government building on Washington Street. For a branch office I was successful through the generous cooperation of Mr. August Hecksher, founder of the Hecksher Foundation, to give the service space in their splendid building uptown. It is in this building where the foundation carries on its activities, such as family relief, care of children, and social work, and it is an ideal and suitable place for our Employment Service branch office. But the Members can readily see that many offers of space may not be suitable. For instance, suppose there is an industry having labor trouble; surely we would not want them to offer space to the United States Employment Service or an offer of space by any large employer of labor known to be unfair to labor; surely we would not want our office in such a place.

With that I hope the gentleman from Alabama will withdraw his objection to the amendments. I submit the matter to the House.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, the House has been very kind about this matter. I want the House to understand that the subcommittee did not bring this in with any view of asking that the House vote either for the provisos or for any cut in the appropriation, unless in the opinion of the House it could be done without hurt to the worthy purposes sought to be accomplished.

I have a tentative understanding with some Members to this effect: That I will amend the limitation as to $2,000 so as to exclude therefrom one manager in each State, whose salary shall not exceed $3,000, and 23 employment managers, whose salaries shall not exceed $2,400.

Mr. CONNERY. The gentleman is not addressing his remarks to me, but to the gentleman behind me, the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I will offer that amendment as soon as I finish.

Now, gentlemen, let us see what we have? The Secretary of Labor, when he asked for a deficiency appropriation in December, made this statement:

> I have been pretty hard-boiled on that rent proposition all the way through. If the communities are not interested enough to furnish this space rent free, I doubt the propriety of putting any office in such a place.

Then again he said:

> I think the local community should furnish quarters rent free, and if they do not furnish them I question the propriety of establishing an office in such a place.

If you will read the hearings you will find that was the feeling of the committee and that was the way this House felt when it favored the $120,000 appropriation, because you placed a limitation on that expenditure to this effect, that no part of this appropriation shall be used to pay any rent. And what were you seeking to do? You were seeking to establish 54 new offices, and you likewise placed a limitation on all salaries of, to wit, $2,000, that could be paid out of the $120,000 thus appropriated.

I have excepted from the limitation as to salaries one manager in every State, whose salary will not exceed $3,000, and 23 employment managers, whose salaries shall not exceed $2,400.

In view of the statements made by the Secretary, and in view of the action taken by the House as to the 54 offices that have been established with funds appropriated in December, I can see no sound reason why after July 1 next we should continue to pay rent anywhere. What sound reason can be offered why at any office, after the beginning of the next fiscal year, higher salaries should be paid than you fixed for the 54 new offices between January 1, and July 1, 1932?

I do not believe that one place should be favored over another.

Mr. CONNERY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Yes.

Mr. CONNERY. The gentleman will remember—though he may not have been present—that when that matter came before the House I asked the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] about this matter, and I said, "Now, positively you do not intend that this shall apply to the permanent offices?" And he said, "Absolutely not."

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I have just made that statement. The gentleman has evidently not caught the line of my reasoning, or perhaps I may not have convinced him. I know my friend from Massachusetts has one of the biggest hearts in the world. He would vote all of the money in the Treasury to some poor, suffering man, if in his judgment the man's needs required it.

Mr. CONNERY. To some unfortunate, broken-down man; yes.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. That is a beautiful and fine spirit, but we can not afford, when we are representing 120,000,000 people, to manifest such liberality, since—well let us in a spirit of charity say, because like liberality could not be shown to all who are in need.

Now, frankly, this is the trouble: The gentleman is insisting that the offices he happens to know of should not be affected in the slightest; he insists that his acquaintances must not be reduced, oh, no; but as to the 54 offices we created since January 1 last, it is all right to declare limitations as to both rent and salaries. All right to limit the salary to $2,000 at such offices. All right that no rent be paid by the 54 offices, but let such rent limitation be applied at no other office. Now, gentlemen, when you come to appropriate and expend money on that kind of a basis it is favoritism. I believe that every place after July 1 should be placed on exactly the same basis as to rent. If you are going to pay rent at one place, pay it everywhere. However, I do not think we should pay it anywhere, and that is the proposition that will be submitted to the committee.

Now, let us come to the real crux of this question. What has happened? The Legion, if you have been listening in on the radio, has organized a force, not of paid men and women, but of volunteers, a force made up of business men, legionaires, members of the Federation of Labor, members of church and civic organizations, and what are they doing? First they seek no money from the Federal Government nor from any State or city, nor from any other source. They have volunteered their services to make a survey of their own cities and towns, just as was done in Rochester, N. Y., and as other cities and communities throughout the Nation are now being organized to do. The slogan in these places is, "We propose that in our city, in our county, in our State, to see that jobs are found for our unemployed." It is a self-reliant, a real American doctrine, and the Legion is the proper organization to direct a great national volunteer movement like that. If you had heard that wonderful message from the director of these volunteer forces on Sunday night last you would know that it started first with a group of about 20, but it has now swollen to a force of more than 1,000,000 strong. Within less than 60 days, we are told, there will be 6,000,000 volunteers engaged in this work. They tell us that jobs in less than six days have been found for 66,000 of the unemployed.

They further declare there will be no let-up until jobs have been found for more than a million.

You tell me then that the Government should continue to expend large sums of money to rent offices and pay large salaries after July 1. Gentlemen, it is not right. It is not in keeping with the spirit of self-reliance that the Legion is striving to inspire in our people, not in keeping with the unpaid, unselfish service of these citizen volunteers. We are living in a day and time when we value human service, and now that communities are aroused to the importance of following the Legion's leadership, why should a limited few demand pay while a million volunteers ask only for the privilege to serve. If you could witness right now that wonderful picture, The Man Who Played God, and catch therefrom the spirit of the Legion, my belief is there would be few votes recorded against the limitations for rent and salaries.

Gentlemen, if we are to meet the Budget, we must make some sacrifices. Why should we select a few who are not in the classified service, men gathered here and there, and say, "We will give you a pay job while millions work, without pay, as volunteers."

Mr. Alpine, the head of this service is an excellent gentleman, most sympathetic, and I have no criticism to make of him. It is the plan and the policy, based on the idea of pay for a humane social service to our fellows, that I complain of.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. McREYNOLDS). The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I accept the amendment of the gentleman increasing the amount to $820,000, which is the amount the Budget recommended.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CONNERY: On page 121, line 21, strike out "$802,500" and insert in lieu thereof "$820,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. OLIVER of Alabama: On page 122, line 5, after the amount "$2,000" insert a comma and the following: "Except one director in each State, whose salary shall not exceed $3,000, and 23 managers of the Veterans' Employment Service, whose salary shall not exceed $2,400."

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. Would my amendment, which affects that same section, go on as a substitute amendment or as an amendment to the amendment? I have an amendment to strike out that provision.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. The gentleman will accomplish his purpose by voting down the amendment and then pressing his amendment.

Mr. CONNERY. But can I not offer my amendment as an amendment to the amendment?

Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. The amendment of the gentleman from Alabama must go as an amendment to my amendment which I have already offered. Is not the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama a substitute for my amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CONNERY] was read for information.

Mr. CONNERY. When I asked that the amendment be read I intended that as an offer of the amendment. That was my intention at the time.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, my amendment is a perfecting amendment.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, under the rules of the House, if the Chair will permit, there can be only one amendment pending at one time. The amendments of the gentleman from Massachusetts were offered and read for information.

The CHAIRMAN. The only amendment pending is the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OLIVER]. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. CONNERY. Then I offer my amendment as a substitute amendment for the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama and ask that it be reported.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CONNERY as a substitute for the amendment offered by Mr. OLIVER of Alabama: On page 122, line 2, after the word "organizations," strike out all of lines 2, 3, 4, and 5.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order the amendment is not a substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. CONNERY. I offer it as an amendment to the amendment, or a substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's amendment is a motion to strike out certain words of the bill, and can not be offered as a substitute.

Mr. CONNERY. If the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama is voted down, it will be in order for me to offer the amendment to strike out.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. CONNERY) there were 78 ayes and 50 noes.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CONNERY. Now, Mr. Chairman, I offer my amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 122, line 2, after the word "organization," strike out the remainder of line 2 and all of lines 3, 4, and 5.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. OLIVER of Alabama) there were 73 ayes and 51 noes.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to return to page 47 for the purpose of offering an amendment. There was a misunderstanding on my part that all sections of the Department of Labor would be taken up to-day.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I prefer to finish the bill, and then I shall have no objection to returning to page 47, as the gentleman suggests.

The Clerk proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

SEC. 2. No appropriation under the Departments of State, Justice, Commerce, and Labor, and the Judiciary, available during the fiscal years 1932 and/or 1933 shall be used after the date of the approval of this act (1) to increase the compensation of any position within the grade to which such position has been allocated under the classification act of 1923, as amended, (2) to increase the compensation of any position in the field service the pay of which is adjustable to correspond so far as may be practicable to the rates established by such act as amended for the departmental service in the District of Columbia, (3) to increase the compensation of any position under such act through reallocation, (4) to increase the compensation of any person in any grade under such act through advancement to another position in the same grade or to a position in a higher grade at a rate in excess of the minimum rate of such higher grade unless such minimum rate would require an actual reduction in compensation, or (5) to increase the compensation of any other position of the Federal Government under such departments and the Judiciary, other than commissioned officers of the Coast and Geodetic Survey; and so much of the acts of February 23, 1931 (U. S. C., Supp. V, title 22, sec. 3a), and February 21, 1931 (U. S. C., Supp. V, title 8, sec. 109), as provides automatic increases of salary, respectively, for Foreign Service officers and immigrant inspectors shall not be operative during the period between the date of the approval of this act and June 30, 1933: Provided, That no additional credits for service shall be allowed to any commissioned officer in the Coast and Geodetic Survey for purposes of base or period pay, or for longevity pay before July 1, 1933; any increase of base or period pay for length of service, or longevity pay, which would have been authorized under existing law before that date, shall become effective July 1, 1933, and not earlier, notwithstanding the provisions of any other act. The appropriations or portions of appropriations unexpended by the operation of this section shall not be used for any other purposes but shall be impounded and returned to the Treasury, and a report of the amounts so impounded for the period between the date of the approval of this act and October 31, 1932, shall be submitted to Congress on the first day of the next regular session.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 124, line 23, strike out the period after the word "act," insert a colon and the following: "Provided further, That from the date of this act, including June 30, 1933, payment for personal services made in accordance herewith shall constitute payment in full for such services."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Now, Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out all of section 2.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. LAGUARDIA: Beginning on page 123, line 14, strike out all of section 2.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, this is the amendment that I have offered on every appropriation bill, and shall continue to do so for the reason that I believe the provision is unfair, unjust, and unnecessary, and does not carry out any economy at all. I believe that the efficiency of the service will be so impaired if this provision is carried out as to offset any apparent saving. In addition to that, there is in this provision automatic increases, the same as applies to the Post Office, to the Army and the Navy, where the pay is fixed by law with automatic yearly increases, particularly in respect to the Coast and Geodetic Survey. I am going to leave that part of the section to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAPES]. Added to the section in this bill makes the limitation even more objectionable. If by this method we are going to cut off salaries fixed by law, it will be manifestly unfair to all of these employees who are entitled to these yearly increases. It is part of their pay. I have been voted down on this amendment in every other bill, but by no means is this provision yet accepted by the Congress. Another body has to act upon it and a committee of that body has already stricken out this limitation from the agricultural appropriation bill.

Mr. McCORMACK. May I say to the gentleman he is not alone in this proposition; that I am with him?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes; and I hope the gentleman and others who are with me will not be discouraged. The method employed is not right and we must continue the fight.

Mr. KVALE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. KVALE. If I understood the amendment that was shoved across so quickly a moment or two ago, I believe its effect will be to automatically eliminate any appeal that might be made later. In other words, I think the amendment stated that all payments made to the end of the next fiscal year would be in full for services, and that automatically stopped an appeal later on.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. If we strike out the whole section, as my amendment provides, of course that vicious amendment will go out also. Here is something fixed by law, something that is a solemn contract, establishing the salaries of these employees, with yearly automatic fixations. It is an attempt not only to cut them off but to take away their legal rights.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. And those employees are looking forward to these increases.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes; these increases are a part of their pay. Let us vote the section out of the bill and carry out what the Senate Committee on Agriculture has done.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word and should like to have the attention of the chairman of the committee for a moment. I direct the attention of the committee to the language on page 124, line 16, after the word "Provided," down to and including the word "act" in line 23, particularly to that part which reads, in line 16, after the word "Provided," as follows:

That no additional credits for service shall be allowed to any commissioned officer in the Coast and Geodetic Survey for purposes of base pay, or period pay, or for longevity pay before July 1, 1933; any increase of base or period pay for length of service or longevity pay, which would have been authorized under existing law before that date, shall become effective July 1, 1933.

Of course this increase on account of longevity was provided for in the so-called pay act of the different services passed in 1922. As I understand it, the Coast and Geodetic Survey is the first of those services to be affected by any appropriation thus far passed by the Committee on Appropriations. Has the full Committee on Appropriations taken a vote or adopted what may be termed a "policy" to have this rule apply to all of the other services as the appropriation bills come in?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Yes. This amendment will apply to the other services to which the gentleman has referred, to wit, the Public Health Service, the Army, the Navy, the Marine Corps, and the Coast Guard. It is not the purpose of the committee to have any limitation carried in one bill that does not apply to all other similar services.

Mr. MAPES. I thank the gentleman for the information. I desire, however, to call the attention of the committee to just what this limitation does so far as the Coast and Geodetic Survey is concerned. It is in language which apparently covers the entire service, but I am told by members of the Coast and Geodetic Survey that it really touches only 42 per cent of the officer personnel of the Coast and Geodetic Survey. I am also told that the principal saving to be effected by this limitation will be borne by the men in the junior grades, the men who receive the least compensation. The 58 per cent not affected by this provision have been promoted, according to their longevity, from time to time before this, and it is now proposed to withhold promotions from those who would otherwise be entitled to it between now and July 1, 1933, or at least during the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1932, and ending June 30, 1933. The entire saving, as I am told, would amount to $11,276 for the fiscal year 1933. Over one-half of this amount will be borne by those who can least afford it, and over one-third will be borne by the officers who at present are drawing the lowest pay in the service, namely, $1,719 per year, and the amount which will be taken from each one of those officers will be $239 per year.

Mr. BYRNS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAPES. I yield.

Mr. BYRNS. Conceding that the amount saved by this particular provision is not particularly large, does the gentleman think that any discrimination should be shown in the passage of these bills with reference to the compensation between the various services of the Government?

Mr. MAPES. Personally I have never understood just how these advances were made in the civilian service, but it seems to me that there must be some distinction between those and the officer personnel in the Army, the Navy, and the Coast and Geodetic Survey.

Mr. BYRNS. I will say to the gentleman that the same provisions of law apply to all of the various military and semimilitary services, and I am sure the gentleman does not want to discriminate in favor of one and against the other.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for three additional minutes.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in five minutes. I will ask for half of the time, and will yield to the gentleman from Michigan one-half of the time.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Michigan two minutes.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, I simply want to emphasize what I have already said, that the bulk of this saving will be borne by the men in the service who receive the least compensation, and I would like to call the attention of the committee to this point, in addition to what I have already said, that the pay act of 1922 authorized readjustments of the allowance for quarters and rations by the President or by some official of the Government, according to the commodity price indices, and that these same officers will also undoubtedly have to suffer a decrease in the allowance in this respect.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman has correctly stated the law. The law provides for an automatic increase, because of longevity pay, in the six services mentioned; but, as the chairman of the committee, Mr. BYRNS, stated, this amendment will apply to all of the other services, and it would be unfair to except the Coast and Geodetic Survey or any other service, since this limitation has already been imposed on the classified employees. They, under existing law, are given seasonal increases, but their increases have been suspended. So it is but proper and consistent that we adopt this amendment in line with what we have heretofore done.

Let me say, further, in this bill an amendment was previously adopted in reference to the Immigration Service. The inspectors get an automatic increase, and the amendment which the committee adopted denied to them $113,000 increase. That action has already been taken. It would be altogether unfair, if we are to adopt a rule that no one shall have an increase, to except a certain class.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

All time has expired.

Mr. MAAS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MAAS: On page 124, line 16, strike out all of lines 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, and through the word "act" in line 23.

Mr. MAAS. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, there is an amendment pending to strike out the entire section.

Mr. TILSON. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota is an amendment to the text, which would have to be acted upon before the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MAAS] is a perfecting amendment and should be acted upon first.

Mr. MAAS. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. The debate was limited to five minutes. I understand only four minutes have been used.

The CHAIRMAN. All time has expired.

The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota.

The amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk again reported the LaGuardia amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, the Clerk seems to have made a mistake with reference to certain amendments offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CONNERY] and myself, and the gentleman from Massachusetts and I have reached an agreement looking to the correction of the same, so I will ask unanimous consent that the vote by which the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts carried be vacated.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

There was no objection.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, the Clerk unintentionally mixed the two amendments, and the result would be exactly different from what the House desired by its vote.

So, in order to straighten out the record, I ask unanimous consent that the proceedings agreeing to the amendment, on page 122, that on line 2, after the word "organizations," we strike out all of lines 2, 3, 4, and 5, be vacated.

I also ask unanimous consent that the following amendment be considered as being agreed to in accordance with the will of the committee: On page 121, line 23, after the word "Columbia," strike out all of lines 23, 24, and 25, and on page 122, strike out all of line 1, and in line 2 the words "by individuals or organizations."

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the gentleman's request will be agreed to.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. No appropriation under the Departments of State, Justice, Commerce, and Labor, and the judiciary available during the fiscal years 1932 and/or 1933 shall be used after the date of the approval of this act to pay the compensation of an incumbent appointed to any position under the Federal Government which is vacant on the date of the approval of this act or to any such position which may become vacant after such date: Provided, That this inhibition shall not apply to absolutely essential positions the filling of which may be approved in writing by the President of the United States. The appropriations or portions of appropriations unexpended by the operation of this section shall not be used for any other purposes but shall be impounded and returned to the Treasury, and a report of all such vacancies, the number thereof filled, and the amounts unexpended, for the period between the date of the approval of this act and October 31, 1932, shall be submitted to Congress on the first day of the next regular session.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. OLIVER of Alabama: On page 125, line 16, strike out the period after the word "States" and insert a comma and the following: "or, in the case of the positions of officers paid out of the appropriations for the Supreme Court of the United States, by the Chief Justice of the United States."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. No part of any money appropriated by this act shall be used for purchasing any motor-propelled passenger-carrying vehicle (except busses, station wagons, and ambulances) at a cost, delivered and completely equipped for operation, in excess of $750, including the value of a vehicle exchanged where exchange is involved; nor shall any money appropriated herein be used for maintaining, driving, or operating any Government-owned motor-propelled passenger-carrying vehicle not used exclusively for official purposes, and "official purposes" shall not include the transportation of officers and employees between their domiciles and places of employment except in cases of officers and employees engaged in field work the character of whose duties makes such transportation necessary, and then only when the same is approved by the head of the department. This section shall not apply to any motor vehicles for official use of the Secretary of State, the Attorney General, the Secretary of Commerce, and the Secretary of Labor.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I rise to express what I feel is in the minds of all members of the committee, a feeling of admiration for the very able and gentlemanly manner in which the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OLIVER] has handled and engineered the passage of this bill through the committee. [Applause.] His conduct has been gentlemanly in the most trying circumstances, and I feel my brief statement reflects the collective opinion of the entire membership of the committee. [Applause.]

I want to say to the gentleman that the people in his district should be congratulated upon having such an able Representative. [Applause.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I am sure the gentleman would be glad to include the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. McCORMACK. Yes. I compliment Judge McREYNOLDS for the very able manner in which he has presided over the committee during the consideration of this bill.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. OLIVER of Alabama: On page 126, after line 16, insert a new section, as follows:

"SEC. 5. No part of any appropriation made by this act shall be used to pay the actual expenses of subsistence in excess of $6 each for any one calendar day or per diem allowance for subsistence in excess of the rate of $5 for any one calendar day to any officer or employee of the United States, and payments accordingly shall be in full, notwithstanding any other statutory provision."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, a point of order. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. PERSON] desires to offer a perfecting amendment to section 4.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I offer this as a new amendment.

Mr. STAFFORD. But the gentleman from Michigan wishes to offer his amendment to section 4.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Then, Mr. Chairman, I will ask unanimous consent to withdraw my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be withdrawn.

There was no objection.

Mr. PERSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out section 4.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. PERSON: Beginning on page 125, line 24, strike out all of section 4.

Mr. PERSON. Mr. Chairman, I realize that nothing I can say at this time will change your predetermination in reference to this automobile amendment as is provided in section 4. However, I feel I would be neglecting my community if I did not call your attention to some of the things that this section seems to involve.

The section would seem to limit the expenditure of any money as provided by this bill for automobiles to $750 per car. I have here Automobile Topics, a trade authority, of January 30, 1932, which gives, on pages 1024 and 1025, the prices of the lowest and the highest of all the automobiles manufactured in the United States, and I desire that this be presented and printed in the RECORD by unanimous consent, so that I will not be compelled to read it, and I now submit that request.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. PERSON. It will be noted that the American Austin can be bought for $330, the Ford for $490, the Chevrolet for $545, the Plymouth for $575, the Rockne 65 for $585, the Willys-Overland 6–90 for $615, the DeVaux 80 for $685, the DeSoto Six for $695, the Pontiac for $695, the Essex for $705, the Rockne 75 for $735, and the Graham Six for $765.

Mr. GOSS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PERSON. Yes.

Mr. GOSS. Are those prices f. o. b. the factory?

Mr. PERSON. These prices are f. o. b. the factory.

Mr. GOSS. And has the gentleman any information about freight rates to the various sections of the country?

Mr. PERSON. The freight rates to the various sections I can not give the gentleman, but I can say that there are several sections in the United States, having in mind this price, to which no car but the Austin can be delivered for the price included in this provision.

Then let us see further what kind of automobiles this bill we are now discussing provides for the use of. Page 7 of the bill states that automobiles shall be purchased for the embassies and the legations. It tells the amount of money that shall be spent for automobiles for the embassies and the legations, and then you amend it by saying you can not have an automobile that costs more than $750. No American automobile, not even the Austin, with the freight added, can be bought in any foreign legation or embassy for the money provided by this provision.

Then the next section provides for automobiles for the consulates. No American automobile, not even the Austin, can be bought in any of the consulates, except possibly in Canada and Mexico, for the amount provided by this amendment; and do you expect to provide your embassies, your legations, and your consulates with Austins and Ford cars under this amendment?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PERSON. No; not just now.

Then a later section provides for automobiles for the International Waterways Commission between the United States and Mexico, and a later section provides for the purchase of automobiles for the use of the International Joint Commission between the United States and Great Britain. Are these cars to be only Austins or Fords? A later section provides for the purchase of cars for the Department of Justice and under the heading "For detection of crime."

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for two additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. PERSON. Under the heading "For the detection of crime and the protection of the President of the United States," the bill provides for the purchase of automobiles, and then provides the limitation as to price of $750. I wonder how you are going to detect crime and protect the President of the United States in Fords and Austins.

Then a later paragraph provides cars for the Bureau of Prohibition. In our State of Michigan, if you are going to use Austin and Ford cars to chase the racketeers and the bootleggers between Detroit and Chicago, your success will be about what it has been in the past. [Laughter.]

Then a later paragraph provides, among other things, for equipment for the carrying out of the immigration law, and makes an appropriation for automobiles. As in the enforcement of the liquor laws the enforcement of the immigration laws requires large and powerful cars.

Now, I want to say that this provision is a political gesture. When I took a stand on the liquor question I decided to face the facts, and I intend to face them on any other question that comes along.

I submit that to leave no discretion in anybody as to the particular car to purchase for a particular purpose is an effort at economy which in the end may prove to be costly. It is "penny-wise and pound foolish."

I realize that this section was not in the bill as originally drawn, but was added to it by the committee, and as I review the enormous amounts carried by this bill as appropriations for various purposes, including the appropriation for the enforcement of the liquor laws, the immigration laws, and various other regulatory provisions, and then see this picayune provision as to automobiles, I conclued that the committee may have "strained at a gnat and swallowed a camel."

It will be noted that the bill under consideration makes appropriations for the purchase by the various departments of almost everything from newspapers to airplanes, and in no place does it make a limitation on the amount to be expended for an individual item except in the case of automobiles.

It will be further noted that the provision in reference to automobiles is intended to save, and actually does save, no money, for the reason that the gross amount of the appropriation is not cut and has not been cut. By decreasing the amount to be expended for each individual car you but increase the number of cars that can be bought with the total appropriation.

I realize that there is no intention of enforcing this provision. It is assumed that there will be chicanery to get around it, but I think we ought to face it squarely.

If employees are misusing their privileges in reference to automobiles and are defrauding the Government by their misuse and abuse, then the rules of the civil-service regulations ought to cover the case, and one of two things ought to happen: Either the employee ought to be let out by the head of his department, or if the head of the department refuses or neglects to discipline the employee, then he, the head of the department, ought to go.

A devious device like this in question surely leads to evasion and secret violation like many others of similar nature. I advise that the situation be met and solved by other means than subterfuge.

(Herewith are added pages 1024 and 1025 of the publication above referred to, and printed herewith by unanimous consent.)

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I ask permission to speak for two minutes. The gentleman from Michigan was unfortunate in his mention of the Prohibition Unit, for the reason that the provision in the bill provides for the purchase of cheap cars for the Prohibition Unit. The Director of Prohibition insisted that he wanted the cheap-class cars. He said they were more economical to operate and met the needs of his service. This amendment is in line with the amendment heretofore adopted, except that we have liberalized it. It was never intended that it should apply to Cabinet officers, and they have been excepted, and we provide that the department heads may permit field officers to go from their homes to their field work in Government cars.

Mr. MAAS. Does that include the freight?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. There is nothing said about freight. They can pay the freight out of contingent expenses if found to be necessary.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan.

The Clerk read as follows:

Beginning on page 125, line 24, strike out all of section 4.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 126, after line 11, insert:

"SEC. 5. No part of any appropriation made by this act shall be used to pay actual expenses of subsistence in excess of $6 for any one calendar day, or per diem allowance for subsistence in excess of the rate of $5 in any one calendar day to any officer or employee of the United States, and payment accordingly shall be in full, notwithstanding any other statutory provision."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment proposed by Mr. OLIVER of Alabama: Page 54, line 25, after the colon, insert the following: "Provided further, That no part of the appropriation herein made shall be used to pay any probation officer a salary in excess of $2,600 per annum."

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I offer that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to return to page 47 for the purpose of offering an amendment. It was through a misunderstanding as to the program to-day that the amendment was not offered when the section was reached.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk:

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LAGUARDIA: Page 47, line 17, at the end of the section strike out the period, insert a colon, and add the following: "Provided, That no money herein appropriated shall be used to operate or maintain in operation any automatic filling machine or any labor-saving machine in any factory conducted in any Federal penal institution where convicts are assigned to work."

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, it seems almost unbelievable in this period when all industry and labor is disturbed with labor-saving machines that we would find labor-saving machines in the penitentiaries. The theory of operating factories in connection with our penal institutions is to give work to the inmates and teach them a trade, to keep them busy, and not to operate an industry for profit in competition with legitimate business and free labor. We authorized and appropriated for a brush factory in the penal institution at Leavenworth, and it was operating successfully in keeping with our theory of institutional care and vocational training. They have now installed labor-saving devices in the brush factory in the penitentiary at Leavenworth.

They have installed there automatic filling machines which fill the tufts in the brush. I have here a brush that is made by hand. The filling in of the tuft is by hand and takes time. The automatic machine will do the work of about 16 men. The brush with the red back which I now exhibit is a machine-filled brush.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. The brush the gentleman has just exhibited is made by hand. The only brush that we make by machine is a paint brush.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The one with the white back that I have here is a brush made by manual labor filled by hand labor. The other is made on an automatic brush machine, with a solid block, which I have described, with a staple board and filled with the same machine.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Are those brushes the gentleman has exhibited made in the penitentiary?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. That is my information.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I have this statement from the director, which I know is correct:

> In making those floor sweeps like Mr. LAGUARDIA has on the table, we do not use one single bit of machinery. All of our floor sweeps are wire-drawn by hand. Each tuft is set individually. Outside concerns use machinery on this brush entirely.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. If they do not use machines, then there is no objection to my amendment.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I want to make a statement about that amendment.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I say that it is a ridiculous situation to have a Federal penal institution at Leavenworth making brushes by machines, and it can not be denied that they are using machines and filling those tufts and competing against industry employing free labor. The American Brush Manufacturers' Association informs me that it is impossible for them to compete with any Federal department in selling their brushes, when they have to compete not only with the convict-made brushes, but with convict machine-made brushes. It is manifestly unfair. If we are going to employ prisoners let them pass their time by filling in these things by hand, but by no means permit the use of these labor-saving devices.

Mr. CONNERY. And this is the evil that we tried to correct when we passed the convict labor law.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Exactly, and we had assurances then that the work would be so conducted as not to compete with free labor. Convict-made brushes in Leavenworth have a preference in the Federal departments, but I submit in all fairness to free labor that it should not be met with competition by convict-made machine brushes. I ask the committee to support my amendment.

Mr. CONNERY. And one of the propositions put out of business was the blind people who made brooms.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. That is true.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, the bill under which the Bureau of Prisons installed the few machines they have is a bill that was passed, I am informed, with the full approval of the Federation of Labor.

I will not have time to read from the hearings further than a few excerpts with reference to the brush machine of which the gentleman has spoken.

I think every Member of Congress has received letters with reference to brushes made in the Federal prisons. When the gentleman from New York exhibited the samples on the table, I asked the Director of Prisons whether brushes of that kind were made by hand or by machinery in the Federal prisons. He said they were made by hand in the Federal prisons, and that only two kinds of brushes are made in the Federal prisons by machinery. They are required to make these by machinery because there is no market value for handmade brushes of this type.

I would like you to understand the number of prisoners employed. There are 90 engaged in making brushes and only 60 of these are assigned to the machines.

I read from the hearings:

> We have manufactured wherever possible a type of brush which will utilize to the maximum hand labor. Of our total production of $159,028.94, we produced $63,614.40 worth of what is known as wire-drawn and pitch-set brushes, which are made entirely by hand. The brush maker in manufacturing a wire-drawn brush weaves each tuft of hair into the block by hand. * * *
> In manufacturing paint and varnish brushes it is necessary to mix the different kinds and lengths of hair which go into the brush in such a manner that the different lengths of bristles will be evenly distributed.

Those are the only two types. In other words, neither the Navy nor the Army could use these brushes unless manufactured by machinery. It is impossible to make the proper inset of hair by hand in paint and varnish brushes. That is why they are required to use the machines in making the limited quantity of these brushes which are manufactured in the prisons.

I do not think you will find anyone who has visited the Federal prisons who will not state that under the direction of Mr. Bates they have followed strictly the spirit of the agreement had with the committee at the time these bills were reported and unanimously passed by the Congress. They have well distributed the industries at the prisons so as not to bring prison goods in competition in any large way with the trade. They sell nothing on the outside, and they meet Government market prices. These bills had the approval of the American Federation of Labor, because it was recognized that it was absolutely essential to provide some work for our prison population.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I yield.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Certainly it was never contemplated that in giving employment to these inmates we should install machines in the brush factory at Leavenworth?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Oh, there were some machines there for making shoes that everyone understood had been installed some time ago, but the amount they turn out is limited.

The prison labor is more in competition with that of farmers than anybody else. Prisons have dairies; they raise fine hogs; they raise everything to eat. Still you never hear complaints from the farmers, because they recognize that the cost of maintaining our prisons comes out of the Federal Treasury; that it is absolutely essential to provide work for prisoners, and, as pointed out, we now have a system whereby we pay to the personnel a small amount, and if the prisoner has a dependent family, a part of his pay is sent to his family, and this practice is in keeping with the spirit of the Hawes and Cooper bill. I think Members may have read the statement recently published by Senator HAWES and Congressman COOPER, analyzing the underlying principles and purposes of this bill, which soon becomes effective.

Mr. DYER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I yield.

Mr. DYER. The purpose of the legislation to provide for the making of the things which are made in the prisons was primarily to give employment to the inmates?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Yes.

Mr. DYER. Of course, I take it there is not any more machinery being installed than is absolutely necessary?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. No.

Mr. DYER. I would not favor it, because a big majority of the prisoners have no employment whatever.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I am very glad the gentleman from Missouri interrupted me, because the gentleman was acting chairman of the committee at the time these bills were considered.

I was very much interested less than two weeks ago in reading the statement by Mr. HAWES and Mr. COOPER as to the purpose of that legislation.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk again reported the LaGuardia amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the Clerk be allowed to make any necessary changes in totals and to correct any typographical errors.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all Members who spoke on the bill have five legislative days in which to extend their remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MAAS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on the amendment I offered.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MAAS. Mr. Speaker, I moved to amend House bill 9349—State, Justice, Commerce, and Labor appropriation bill—by striking out the following proviso:

That no additional credits for service shall be allowed to any commissioned officer in the Coast and Geodetic Survey for purposes of base or period pay, or for longevity pay, before July 1, 1933; any increase of base or period pay for length of service, or longevity pay, which would have been authorized under existing law before that date, shall become effective July 1, 1933, and not earlier, notwithstanding the provisions of any other act.

The effect of the above provision is to freeze pay of commissioned officers of the Coast and Geodetic Survey in so far as any increase in pay based on length of service is concerned. Since the Coast and Geodetic Survey is paid under the pay act of 1922, which also applies to the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, Public Health Service, and Coast Guard, similar provisions, no doubt, will be included in the appropriation bills pertaining to each of these services. Consequently, each of these services is vitally interested in securing the elimination of the provision in House bill 9349 as the line of departure in the fight to keep it out or eliminate it from the other appropriation bills which pertain to these services which are still to be reported.

Among the objectionable features of the provision may be enumerated the following:

First. It infringes upon the prerogatives of the legislative committee concerned. In effect, it holds in abeyance a portion of the provision of the pay act of 1922 until July 1, 1933.

Second. The savings effected are comparatively trifling, amounting for the Coast and Geodetic Survey to about $12,000 in pay and $3,000 or $4,000 in allowances. If this amount were spread over the entire commissioned personnel of the Coast and Geodetic Survey, namely, 171 officers, in proportion to the pay and allowances they are now receiving, the injustice of the provision would be limited to singling out one group for pay reduction. But as now proposed its effect is much worse. The entire burden of the saving is borne by a minority of 73 out of 171 officers. And among these 73 officers the maximum portion of the burden is borne by those in the lower grades; in other words, by those least able to shoulder it, as evidenced by the following tabulation of those affected:

Grade	Number	Amount of loss
Commander	1	$193
Lieutenant commanders	8	1,214
Lieutenants	38	3,826
Lieutenants, junior grade	26	6,283
Total	73	11,516

Thirty-seven officers lose less than $100; 24 officers lose between $100 and $200; 2 officers lose between $200 and $300.

All of these are junior officers: Four officers lose between $300 and $400; 2 officers lose between $500 and $600; 2 officers lose between $600 and $700; 1 officer loses $1,168; 1 officer loses $1,263.

Ten officers at the bottom will lose a total of $5,000.

Third. In the other services involved the injustice is even greater. In the Army, for example, the total saving effected will not exceed $600,000, or less than one-half of 1 per cent of the appropriation for pay. This loss, for it is a loss, is borne by the following:

Grade	Number	Amount of loss
Second lieutenants	215	$160,000
Do	253	12,000
First lieutenants	94	43,240
Do	65	14,720
Do	180	6,840
Captains and majors	[1] 200	55,815
Lieutenant colonels	142	1,917
Generals and colonels	------	Nothing.
Nurses	------	54,156
Longevity pay	------	250,759

[1] Estimated.

The last item (longevity pay) affects less than one-third of the officers, and only those below lieutenant colonels of 30 years' service.

From the foregoing it clearly appears that—

Only a comparatively trifling saving is effected, less than one-half of 1 per cent.

The glaring injustice is that about $400,000 of the $600,000 saving, or more than 65 per cent, will be borne by lieutenants and nurses, and about $300,000 of this $400,000, or one-half of the whole $600,000, is borne by about 400 lieutenants and the nurses.

Fourth. To further illustrate this injustice in the Army, the effect of the provision would be to single out certain Military Academy classes and deny to them what all other classes get and what the law plainly held out to them they likewise would get. The class of 1927 (174 second lieutenants), who graduated on June 14, 1927, under the law would pass into the second pay period on June 14, 1932; that is, upon completion of five years' service. Since the appropriation bill no doubt will be approved prior to June 14, 1932, this class alone of all classes since 1922 would be denied this advance, which is the most vital advance in their Army career. These young men now range in age from 26 to 30, the normal time in life to enter the marital state. Many of them, relying upon the promise of the Government that they would receive this advance, have married and incurred proper and natural obligations, which they could have cared for if the situation remained as they were entitled to believe it would remain. Now to find themselves faced with these obligations and denied the means to take care of them is a blow the consequences of which reach most serious proportions.

Of like effect, with only slightly less serious results, is the application of the provision to the class of 1922 and the officers appointed from other sources in that year, who will reach the third pay period on 10 years' services in 1932.

Fifth. An additional injustice is imposed on 215 second lieutenants, who compose the Military Academy class of 1927 and appointments from civil life on dates near the time of graduation of this class, in that the 1927 Naval Academy class, due to the system of promotion in the Navy, were promoted three years after graduation, or in June, 1930, and upon such promotion went into the second pay period, thus attaining the advance which the provision being discussed would deny these 215 second lieutenants after five years' service.

It can not be believed, after being informed of the actual results of this provision and the serious injustices which it visits upon such a relatively small number, and that small number made up almost entirely of junior officers and nurses, that Congress will want to accomplish the comparatively small saving in the manner proposed.

Another feature is that since the various appropriation bills will be approved on different dates, and these provisions for freezing pay will become effective on approval, there results a further inequality as between the services. It would seem that a matter of this kind should be included in one bill, if submitted at all, and considered by the legislative committees and not included in the different appropriation bills. While the Pou resolution probably authorizes this, it is believed that Congress considered that this freezing process would be spread proportionately throughout the services involved. Such a spread is far from the facts. A very limited number of juniors stand practically the entire burden.

We are dealing with a temporary condition, and the amount saved is more political than economic. But the serious effect will be more permanent. It will discourage the highest type of young men from entering the military and semimilitary services, and in the end decreased efficiency will more than offset any trifling saving in pay or allowances now.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. McREYNOLDS, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 9349) making appropriations for the Departments of State and Justice and for the Judiciary, and for the Departments of Commerce and Labor, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, and for other purposes, and had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them en gros.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I offer a motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman opposed to the bill?

Mr. CANNON. I am, in its present form.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Is that sufficient opposition to a bill, that the gentleman is opposed to it as it stands?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman says he is opposed to the bill.

The Clerk will report the motion to recommit.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. CANNON moves to recommit the bill to the Committee on Appropriations, with instructions to report the same back forthwith with the following amendment: On page 52, at line 16, strike out the figures "$775,000" and insert in lieu thereof the figures "$1,050,000."

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask that the House adjourn, and take the vote on the motion to recommit to-morrow. I gave some assurance to Members that if there was to be a roll call the vote would not be taken this afternoon.

The SPEAKER. Let the Chair state to the gentleman from Alabama that if the previous question is ordered the vote on the motion to recommit would come on next Thursday. It would be the unfinished business on Thursday. To-morrow is Calendar Wednesday.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the request.

Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the motion to recommit.

The previous question was ordered.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. SCHAFER) there were—ayes 1, noes 198.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SCHAFER. Is this procedure correct? The gentleman from Missouri, a member of the Appropriations Committee, made a motion to recommit and thereby prevented other Members who had bona fide motions to recommit from offering them.

My parliamentary inquiry is whether the spirit and the letter of the rules are complied with by denying a Member who is not a member of the Appropriations Committee and who has a motion to recommit—who is opposed to the bill in its present form and will vote for his motion to recommit—the right to do so?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin propounds a parliamentary inquiry. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CANNON] is a member of the Committee on Appropriations. The gentleman stated he is opposed to the bill. The gentleman has preference, under the custom and rules of the House, to make the motion to recommit.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground there is not a quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin makes the point of order there is not a quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and ninety-seven Members present; not a quorum.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 6 o'clock and 18 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, February 24, 1932, at 12 o'clock noon.

SENATE

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 24, 1932

The Chaplain, Rev. ZeBarney T. Phillips, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Eternal One, by whose Spirit we are made sons and heirs of the living God; grant us by the same Spirit to hear Thy voice speaking within us, in the sense of duty, in the ideals of righteousness, in the principle of love opposing selfishness, in the nobler thought disturbing our contentment with that which is unworthy. Abide with us this day, and when we seem to fail, suffer the burden of our weakness to remain till we touch, not the dust and ashes of despair but the healing waters of repentance, that by Thy mercy we may be lifted into realms of new resolve and greater endeavor in the service of our country and our God. We ask it through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

THE 9-POWER TREATY—LETTER FROM THE SECRETARY OF STATE

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I ask to have printed in the RECORD a letter which I have just received from the Secretary of State.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE SECRETARY OF STATE,
Washington, February 23, 1932.

MY DEAR SENATOR BORAH: You have asked my opinion whether, as has been sometimes recently suggested, present conditions in China have in any way indicated that the so-called 9-power treaty has become inapplicable or ineffective or rightly in need of modification, and if so, what I considered should be the policy of this Government.

This treaty, as you of course know, forms the legal basis upon which now rests the "open-door" policy toward China. That policy, enunciated by John Hay in 1899, brought to an end the struggle among various powers for so-called spheres of interest in China which was threatening the dismemberment of that empire. To accomplish this Mr. Hay invoked two principles (1) equality of commercial opportunity among all nations in dealing with China, and (2) as necessary to that equality the preservation of China's territorial and administrative integrity. These principles were not new in the foreign policy of America. They had been the principles upon which it rested in its dealings with other nations for many years. In the case of China they were invoked to save a situation which not only threatened the future development and sovereignty of that great Asiatic people but also threatened to create dangerous and constantly increasing rivalries between the other nations of the world. War had already taken place between Japan and China. At the close of that war three other nations intervened to prevent Japan from obtaining some of the results of that war claimed by her. Other nations sought and had obtained spheres of interest. Partly as a result of these actions a serious uprising had broken out in China which endangered the legations of all the powers at Peking. While the attack on those legations was in progress, Mr. Hay made an announcement in respect to this policy as the principle upon which the powers should act in the settlement of the rebellion. He said:

"The policy of the Government of the United States is to seek a solution which may bring about permanent safety and peace to China, preserve Chinese territorial and administrative entity, protect all rights guaranteed to friendly powers by treaty and international law, and safeguard for the world the principle of equal and impartial trade with all parts of the Chinese Empire."

He was successful in obtaining the assent of the other powers to the policy thus announced.

In taking these steps Mr. Hay acted with the cordial support of the British Government. In responding to Mr. Hay's announcement, above set forth, Lord Salisbury, the British Prime Minister, expressed himself "most emphatically as concurring in the policy of the United States."

For 20 years thereafter the open-door policy rested upon the informal commitments thus made by the various powers. But in the winter of 1921 to 1922, at a conference participated in by all of the principal powers which had interests in the Pacific, the policy was crystallized into the so-called 9-power treaty, which gave definition and precision to the principles upon which the policy rested. In the first article of that treaty the contracting powers, other than China, agreed:

1. To respect the sovereignty, the independence, and the territorial and administrative integrity of China.

2. To provide the fullest and most unembarrassed opportunity to China to develop and maintain for herself an effective and stable government.

3. To use their influence for the purpose of effectually establishing and maintaining the principle of equal opportunity for the commerce and industry of all nations throughout the territory of China.

4. To refrain from taking advantage of conditions in China in order to seek special rights or privileges which would abridge the rights of subjects or citizens of friendly states, and from countenancing action inimical to the security of such states.

This treaty thus represents a carefully developed and matured international policy intended, on the one hand, to assure to all of the contracting parties their rights and interests in and with regard to China, and on the other hand to assure to the people of China the fullest opportunity to develop without molestation their sovereignty and independence according to the modern and enlightened standards believed to maintain among the peoples of this earth. At the time this treaty was signed it was known that China was engaged in an attempt to develop the free institutions of a self-governing republic after her recent revolution from an autocratic form of government; that she would require many years of both economic and political effort to that end; and that her progress would necessarily be slow. The treaty was thus a covenant of self-denial among the signatory powers in deliberate renunciation of any policy of aggression which might tend to interfere with that development. It was believed—and the whole history of the development of the open-door policy reveals that faith—that only by such a process, under the protection of such an agreement, could the fullest interests not only of China but of all nations which have intercourse with her best be served.

In its report to the President announcing this treaty, the American delegation, headed by the then Secretary of State, Mr. Charles E. Hughes, said:

"It is believed that through this treaty the 'open door' in China has at last been made a fact."

During the course of the discussions which resulted in the treaty the chairman of the British delegation, Lord Balfour, had stated that—

"The British Empire delegation understood that there was no representative of any power around the table who thought that the old practice of 'spheres of interest' was either advocated by any government or would be tolerable to this conference. So far as the British Government were concerned, they had in the most formal manner publicly announced that they regarded this practice as utterly inappropriate to the existing situation."

At the same time the representative of Japan, Baron Shidehara, announced the position of his Government as follows:

"No one denies to China her sacred right to govern herself. No one stands in the way of China to work out her own great national destiny."

The treaty was originally executed by the United States, Belgium, the British Empire, China, France, Italy, Japan, the Netherlands, and Portugal. Subsequently it was also executed by Norway, Bolivia, Sweden, Denmark, and Mexico. Germany has signed it, but her parliament has not yet ratified it.

It must be remembered also that this treaty was one of several treaties and agreements entered into at the Washington conference by the various powers concerned, all of which were interrelated and interdependent. No one of these treaties can be disregarded without disturbing the general understanding and equilibrium which were intended to be accomplished and effected by the group of agreements arrived at in their entirety. The Washington conference was essentially a disarmament conference, aimed to promote the possibility of peace in the world not only through the cessation of competition in naval armament but also by the solution of various other disturbing problems which threatened the peace of the world, particularly in the Far East. These problems were all interrelated. The willingness of the American Government to surrender its then commanding lead in battleship construction and to leave its positions at Guam and in the Philippines without further fortification was predicated upon, among other things, the self-denying covenants contained in the 9-power treaty, which assured the nations of the world not only of equal opportunity for their eastern trade but also against the military aggrandizement of any other power at the expense of China. One can not discuss the possibility of modifying or abrogating those provisions of the 9-power treaty without considering at the same time the other promises upon which they were really dependent.

Six years later the policy of self-denial against aggression by a stronger against a weaker power, upon which the 9-power treaty had been based, received a powerful reinforcement by the execution by substantially all the nations of the world of the pact of Paris, the so-called Kellogg-Briand pact. These two treaties represent independent but harmonious steps taken for the purpose of aligning the conscience and public opinion of the world in favor of a system of orderly development by the law of nations, including the settlement of all controversies by methods of justice and peace instead of by arbitrary force. The program for the protection of China from outside aggression is an essential part of any such development. The signatories and adherents of the 9-power treaty rightly felt that the orderly and peaceful development of the 400,000,000 people inhabiting China was necessary to the peaceful welfare of the entire world and that no program for the welfare of the world as a whole could afford to neglect the welfare and protection of China.

The recent events which have taken place in China, especially the hostilities, which, having been begun in Manchuria, have laterally been extended to Shanghai, far from indicating the advisability of any modification of the treaties we have been discussing, have tended to bring home the vital importance of the faithful observance of the covenants therein to all of the nations interested in the Far East. It is not necessary in that connection to inquire into the causes of the controversy or attempt to apportion the blame between the two nations which are unhappily involved, for regardless of cause or responsibility, it is clear beyond peradventure that a situation has developed which can not under any circumstances be reconciled with the obligations of the covenants of these two treaties, and that if the treaties had been faithfully observed such a situation could not have arisen. The signatories of the 9-power treaty and of the Kellogg-Briand pact who are not parties to that conflict are not likely to see any reason for modifying the terms of those treaties. To them the real value of the faithful performance of the treaties has been brought sharply home by the perils and losses to which their nationals have been subjected in Shanghai.

That is the view of this Government. We see no reason for abandoning the enlightened principles which are embodied in these treaties. We believe that this situation would have been avoided had these covenants been faithfully observed, and no evidence has come to us to indicate that a due compliance with them would have interfered with the adequate protection of the legitimate rights in China of the signatories of those treaties and their nationals.

On January 7 last, upon the instruction of the President, this Government formally notified Japan and China that it would not recognize any situation, treaty, or agreement entered into by those governments in violation of the covenants of these treaties, which affected the rights of our Government or its citizens in China. If a similar decision should be reached and a similar position taken by the other governments of the world, a caveat will be placed upon such action which we believe will effectively bar the legality hereafter of any title or right sought to be obtained by pressure or treaty violation, and which, as has been shown by history in the past, will eventually lead to the restoration to China of rights and titles of which she may have been deprived.

In the past our Government, as one of the leading powers on the Pacific Ocean, has rested its policy upon an abiding faith in the future of the people of China and upon the ultimate success in dealing with them of the principles of fair play, patience, and mutual good will. We appreciate the immensity of the task which lies before her statesmen in the development of her country and its government. The delays in her progress, the instability of her attempts to secure a responsible government, were foreseen by Messrs. Hay and Hughes and their contemporaries and were the very obstacles which the policy of the open door was designed to meet. We concur with those statesmen, representing all the nations, in the Washington conference who decided that China was entitled to the time necessary to accomplish her development. We are prepared to make that our policy for the future.

Very sincerely yours,

HENRY L. STIMSON.

The Hon. WILLIAM E. BORAH,
United States Senate.

THE FAR EASTERN CRISIS

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, upon request, I present a petition signed by A. Lawrence Lowell, president of Harvard University, and others, with reference to the Far Eastern crisis, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

There being no objection, the letter of transmittal and accompanying petition were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NATIONAL PRESS BUILDING,
Washington, D. C., February 20, 1932.

Senator DAVID I. WALSH,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR WALSH: I have the honor of transmitting to you, on behalf of President A. Lawrence Lowell, of Harvard University, and his cosigners, the inclosed petition with reference to the Far Eastern crisis.

Will you be good enough to bring this petition to the attention of the Senate.

Very respectfully yours,

RAYMOND T. RICH.

To the United States Senate:

The events in Manchuria, and still more at Shanghai, have shown that protests by other governments and the public opinion of the world will not alone restrain the use of armed force to attain national ends.

China has asked for an extraordinary session of the Assembly of the League of Nations to consider the acts of Japanese troops upon her soil. If it shall be found that Japan has resorted to war without submitting the dispute to arbitration, judicial settlement, or to the council—none of which has been done—it will be the covenanted duty of all the members of the league to prohibit trade and financial relations of their countries with the covenant-breaking state, and to prevent all intercourse with that state by the people of any other state, whether a member of the league or not.

Obviously this can not in fact be done in the case of Japan without the concurrence of the United States; nor will any steps be taken toward it without assurance that, if taken, this country will concur. The United States is not a member of the league, but it is a party to the Kellogg-Briand pact of Paris, and there can be no doubt that Japan, contrary to that pact, has sought to settle a dispute by other than pacific means. What will our Government do? Will it refuse to sever commercial relations and thereby prevent almost all the rest of the world from bringing to bear economic pressure which will certainly stop the present bloodshed; or will it act in harmony with other nations to stop it?

We, the undersigned, appeal to the President and Congress to signify to the league that we will concur in economic measures it may take to restore peace.

WISCONSIN

Milwaukee-Downer College, Milwaukee: Aleida J. Pieters, department of government.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, in connection with the remarks just submitted by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] I would like to have printed in the RECORD and appropriately referred a manifesto by the Chinese Students League of Greater New York.

There being no objection, the matter was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE SHANGHAI CRISIS—ALL EYES LOOK TO AMERICA

How it started: As a result of Japan's occupation of Manchuria, the Chinese people refused to buy Japanese goods as a means of passive resistance. Japan concentrated her navy at Shanghai and delivered an ultimatum to the Chinese municipal government on January 27 demanding the immediate suppression of Chinese boycotting activities. Japan threatened drastic action in case the demands were not accepted. Desiring to maintain peace at all cost, the mayor of Shanghai accepted every one of the Japanese demands. But immediately after the Japanese consul-general pronounced the Chinese reply "satisfactory," Japanese marines bombarded the unfortified and densely populated metropolitan area of Chapei with heavy artillery and six bombing planes. Japan has made war on China without declaration.

Accomplishments of the Japanese Navy: Ten thousand homes were demolished on the night of January 28 alone. Thousands of civilians, mostly women and children who are defenseless, were either burned or buried alive. More than a million people were driven away from their homes. Fire set to the buildings of Chapei by Japanese bombs devoured whatever the shells had left. Since January 28 the Japanese kept up their bombardment almost daily. Even cultural institutions, including schools and libraries, have not been spared.

Chinese soldiers made heroic resistance: Under the heavy bombardment and onslaught the Chinese soldiers have not flinched. They have been fighting against all odds, but they are determined to defend their fatherland to "the last man and the last round of ammunition." Up to February 4 they have repelled their invaders seven times.

An unfair advantage: The Japanese troops are using the International Settlement as their base of operation. The Chinese can not return fire without jeopardizing American and European interests. The powers do not allow Chinese soldiers to enter the settlement, but they allow the Japanese to hold a neutral area from which they can attack the Chinese without fear of being attacked.

All eyes turn to America: America has stood for the "open door policy" in the Far East since the days of John Hay. America called the Washington conference in 1922 to protect China's territorial and administrative integrity. Secretary Kellogg is one of the originators of the pact of Paris. The world to-day is looking to America to uphold world peace, justice, righteousness, and the sanctity of international treaties.

Aside from idealistic reasons, it is hoped that America will act for self-defense purposes. More than a billion dollars of American money are now invested in China. If Japan should control China, a severe blow will be dealt to American trade in the Orient. Moreover, with China subdued, Japan will soon extend her greedy hands to the Philippines and the Hawaiian Islands.

Note writing ineffective: Since the beginning of the Sino-Japanese conflict Secretary of State Stimson has spared no pains in protesting to Tokyo. The Chinese people are highly appreciative of his efforts, but these American protests have fallen on deaf ears. Japanese militarism can not be stopped by diplomatic protests. The day of note writing has passed. More drastic measures are necessary to save the situation.

No fear of a world war: We do not want to involve this country or any other powers in a world war against Japan. We have decided to fight our battles ourselves. We only request that you will use your tremendous military, naval, and economic power to remove the following handicaps under which we are operating:

1. Maintain the strict neutrality of the International Settlement. Allow neither Chinese nor Japanese to march through it or use it as a base from which to launch an attack.

2. Place an embargo upon the export of arms and ammunition to Japan. Your arms are being used to kill thousands of our civilians, women and children.

3. Place an embargo on the sale of cotton to Japan. From your cotton the Japanese make explosives that have demolished our peaceful cities and slaughtered thousands of noncombatants without warning.

4. Do not contribute to the Japanese war chest by purchasing Japanese silk and other Japanese goods.

This is all the help we ask. You can give it to us without the slightest loss to the United States, because the moment the embargo is declared Japan would have to yield to the peace proposals of the western powers which she now stubbornly rejects. Neither would she contemplate war against the United States, for she can not afford to lose her profitable foreign trade with this country. Won't you write to your President, Secretary of State, or Member of Congress asking them to take immediate action like the above to save an old civilization from being destroyed and 400,000,000 of your friends from being ruthlessly slaughtered?

REMONETIZATION OF SILVER

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a letter from Gov. George W. P. Hunt, of Arizona, a letter from the Pekin (N. Dak.) Cooperative Elevator Co., and a letter and a petition from Ionia, Mich., signed by sundry citizens, indorsing my bill for the remonetization of silver. I ask that the documents be referred to the Committee on Finance and printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letters were referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

EXECUTIVE OFFICE, STATEHOUSE,
Phoenix, Ariz., February 16, 1932.

Hon. BURTON K. WHEELER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I have read your bill and speech with much interest and satisfaction. There is always a day of settlement. The Bourbons never learned anything and never forgot anything. In my opinion, if they do not yield to common sense this time, the general public will not waste any more patience on them. A public that is now willing to meet them half way is far different from a public that will act without considering them at all.

There is no question at all but that the depreciation of silver since 1926 has given its contribution to the present depression. Expansion of bank credit is a beneficial moratorium, but it will not restore the purchasing power of half the people of the earth who have had their wealth in silver destroyed, nor will it restore the export trade of this country.

The reason silver did not win in 1896, aside from the unprecedented campaign fund, was the ignorance of so large a part of the people. I believe we should have this in mind at the outset of the campaign this time and take effective steps to educate the public. With this in mind, I am inclosing a paper on the subject prepared by Mr. C. M. Zander, of my official family, and carried to the silver conference at Denver by John E. Russell, Arizona's representative to the conference. Will you kindly give me your feeling with respect to the suggestion offered in this paper. I am moved by the thought that if the Senate would develop the facts, the subject would be lifted from the weakness of mere assertion to the impressiveness of new discoveries.

I hope and trust much good will come from your efforts.

With best wishes, I remain, sincerely yours,

GEO. W. P. HUNT,
Governor.

PEKIN, N. DAK., February 16, 1932.

Hon. BURTON K. WHEELER,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: The following resolution was adopted by our board of directors at their meeting February 15, 1932:

"Resolved, That we are strongly in favor of Senator WHEELER's bill (S. 2487) to establish a bimetallic system of currency, and sincerely trust you will be able to secure the passage of this bill during the present session of Congress."

Sincerely yours,

PEKIN CO-OPERATIVE ELEVATOR CO.,
By L. O. FREDRICKSON, Secretary.

IONIA, MICH., February 15, 1932.

Hon. BURTON K. WHEELER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: During the campaign last fall in this eighth congressional district I frequently heard the remark, "Bryan was right in 1896, mankind is being crucified upon a cross of gold," and having taken an active part in that campaign I became curious to learn how much sentiment favorable to a restoration of the free coinage of silver there was among the younger generation of voters in this vicinity. Last Saturday I took the inclosed typewritten sheets and made a 3-hour canvass among the shoppers on our main street. It was not a selective canvass. Every person I encountered, who was not busily engaged, was handed a sheet. Invariably, on reading it, they would reach for my pencil saying: "Yes; I want to sign this." I was surprised to see how eager and glad they were to have the opportunity to express their approval. I only found seven or eight who demurred. Most of these signers are farmers, several are professional and business men, and a few are workingmen. Judging from this hit-and-miss canvass I infer that a very large majority of the voters in this vicinity are emphatically in favor of a return to bimetallism. Another thing that impressed me was the frequently expressed opinion that our banking laws should be revised and depositors protected and assured from loss by the Government. All were skeptical of the success of Mr. Hoover's appeal to the people to return to the banks their savings that they had drawn out and were hoarding. The people have certainly lost confidence in banks and bankers and are looking as never before to Congress for leadership and constructive legislation.

Respectfully yours,

L. P. BROCK,
409 Union Street, Ionia, Mich.

Hon. BURTON K. WHEELER,
United States Senator, Washington, D. C.:

The undersigned citizens of Ionia, Mich. (Republicans and Democrats), hereby express their hearty approval of your bill to restore bimetallism by providing for the free coinage of both gold and silver and urge that you press its speedy enactment into law.

A. A. BAXTER,
L. P. BROCK
(And sundry other citizens of Ionia, Mich.).

CROP INSURANCE

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I introduce a bill to aid in determining the practicability of crop insurance, and I ask that the bill may be set out in the RECORD, together with a brief analysis of it which I have prepared.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The bill (S. 3793) to aid in determining the practicability of crop insurance was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A bill (S. 3793) to aid in determining the practicability of crop insurance

Be it enacted, etc., That in order to test the practicability of crop insurance the Federal Farm Board, created under the agricultural marketing act, approved June 15, 1929, is hereby authorized, in its discretion, to enter into reinsurance or excess loss reinsurance contracts with mutual, cooperative, and/or other insurance organizations approved by the board, which insure or may hereafter insure growing crops against groups or combinations of hazards to which growing crops are usually subject, to an amount equal at least to a substantial part of the cost of producing any crop, as determined by the Federal Farm Board. The total amount of such reinsurance shall not exceed $50,000,000. Such reinsurance contracts shall contain such terms and conditions and be written for such premiums as may be prescribed from time to time by the Federal Farm Board: In the event of a loss arising on account of any such reinsurance contract entered into as aforesaid, the amount thereof shall be paid from the revolving fund provided for in said agricultural marketing act on vouchers approved by the chairman of the Federal Farm Board, as provided for in said act, and all premiums paid for such reinsurance contracts shall be covered into said revolving fund.

SEC. 2. That when the Federal Farm Board is of the opinion that a satisfactory test has been made as to whether crop insurance and reinsurance of crop insurance may be successfully written by private enterprise, the Federal Farm Board shall so report to Congress and thereafter shall not enter into any additional reinsurance contracts, but until the submission of such a report the Federal Farm Board shall annually report to Congress the work done under this act, with such recommendations as may be deemed advisable.

The analysis of the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ANALYSIS OF PURPOSE OF ABOVE BILL PREPARED BY SENATOR SHEPPARD

Practically every other process of modern production is insured against physical calamities and hazards except the process of producing field crops. It is this factor that constitutes one of the principal causes of the tragic instability and uncertainty of farming, the occupation on which the world depends for its food and clothing. The farmer is thus condemned to carry the chief economic burden of our present civilization. Science and progress have left him, so far as his growing crops are concerned, almost as much as ever at the mercy of physical calamities and hazards. This is a situation which should not be permitted if it can be avoided.

The object of this bill is to determine the practicability of the insurance of growing crops by private enterprise through an experimental system of excess loss insurance or reinsurance contracts by the Farm Board with cooperative and ordinary business organizations for a sufficient time to permit a thorough study and a practical trial of the subject to be made. Reports of progress are to be made from time to time to Congress, and when a complete and satisfactory trial has been made Government cooperation ceases.

PROPOSED ANTI-INJUNCTION LEGISLATION—AMENDMENTS

Mr. HEBERT submitted sundry amendments intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 935) to amend the Judicial Code and to define and limit the jurisdiction of courts sitting in equity, and for other purposes, which were ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

AMENDMENT TO INTERIOR DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. ODDIE submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to House bill 8397, the Interior Department appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed, as follows:

On page 73, line 7, strike out "$45,000" and insert "$146,000," so as to read:

"Provided, That of this fund not to exceed $146,000 shall be available for the erection, operation, and maintenance of necessary school buildings and appurtenances on the Boulder Canyon project Federal reservation, and for the purchase and repair of required desks, furnishings, and other suitable facilities; for payment of compensation to teachers and other employees necessary for the efficient conduct and operation of schools on said reservation."

ADDRESSES BY PRESIDENT HOOVER AND REPRESENTATIVE BECK

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, it is my understanding that the House will pass a concurrent resolution to print as a document the proceedings on Monday last commemorating the two hundredth anniversary of the birth of George Washington, which includes the addresses of President Hoover and Representative JAMES M. BECK, of Pennsylvania. I therefore ask that the order made by the Senate on yesterday to print these two addresses as a document be rescinded.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

GOVERNMENT FOR AMERICAN SAMOA

Mr. JONES. A few days ago I entered a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill (S. 417) to provide a government for American Samoa had passed the Senate. It is a bill to provide a government for American Samoa. I will state first the reason why I desire to have the vote whereby the bill was passed reconsidered, and I think there will be no objection to my request. The bill contains a provision under which the coastwise laws are not extended to the Samoan Islands. I desire to propose to that provision of the bill an amendment reading in this way:

Until the President of the United States, after a full investigation of the local needs and conditions, shall, by proclamation, declare that an adequate shipping service has been established to such islands and fix a date for going into effect of the same.

The amendment, if agreed to, would suspend the coastwise laws as to the Samoan Islands until the conditions mentioned are complied with. That is why I ask for the reconsideration of the vote whereby the bill was passed.

Mr. BINGHAM. I hope the request of the Senator from Washington may be granted, Mr. President. I have no objection to it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, the votes whereby the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed will be reconsidered. The bill is now before the Senate.

Mr. JONES. I offer the amendment which I have read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Washington proposes an amendment to the bill, which will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. After the word "States" in line 16, page 6, it is proposed to strike out the period and insert a comma and the following:

Until the President of the United States, after a full investigation of the local needs and conditions, shall by proclamation declare that an adequate shipping service has been established to such islands and fix a date for going into effect of the same.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Washington.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

TARIFF ON COPPER

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to recur to the order of morning business relating to the presentation of petitions and memorials. I wish to speak for a few moments.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Senator from Arizona is recognized.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, unemployment and continued business depression—the most distressing calamities that could happen to a State—have come to Arizona. The financial structure of the State of Arizona is built upon and around the copper industry. This one industry, directly and indirectly, pays over 50 per cent of the taxes raised in the State and supports about one-third of the population. The collapse of copper mining in Arizona literally means bankruptcy for that State. Copper is mined in 19 of the States of the Union. Arizona is the largest producer, with about one-half of the total output.

Thousands of American copper miners and smelter men in Arizona are now and for many months past have been without employment. Although these men and their families have met this unemployment crisis with brave hearts, it is sadly true that misery and despair all too soon descend upon persons who are long unemployed, and this distress in the copper-producing industry is the result of free trade on copper.

For more than a generation opponents of the Democratic Party have attempted to staple to that party the epithet "free trade." The Democratic Party never was for free trade. It was James Madison—a great Democrat, who assisted in writing the Federal Constitution, who was eight years Secretary of State under President Thomas Jefferson, and who was afterwards for eight years President of the United States—who piloted through the First Congress of the United States the first bill ever passed, and it was a tariff bill. The preamble of that tariff bill, guided, as I said before, through the Congress by the genius of James Madison, recited substantially the following:

Whereas it is necessary for the support of government, for the discharge of the debts of the United States, and the encouragement and protection, etc., that duties be laid on goods, wares, and merchandise imported.

Democrats should assert themselves and vehemently to point out these facts. The lack of a tariff on copper is one of the results of free trade against which I inveigh upon every proper opportunity. Our copper mines are shut, owing partly to the unprecedented rise in foreign production. Our American copper miners and smelter men can not, and should not be required to try to, compete with the cheap insensate copper production of foreign countries such as Africa and South America.

The Republican Party is now in some distress, occasioned partly because it has advocated tariffs to protect the products of the factory, but it has refused in most instances to advocate tariffs to protect the products of the mines, the farm, the field, and the ranch. That party will be further debilitated unless it fairly stands for tariffs on the products of the mines, the farm, the field, and the ranch as well as on the products of the factory.

Mr. President, on the 16th of last June, before the Globe (Ariz.) Chamber of Commerce, my colleague, Senator HAYDEN, delivered an address showing the necessity for a tariff on copper and pointing out the absurdity and the injustice of free trade in copper. I need not do more than to say that when the superb intellect of my colleague gives attention to a subject what he says is well worth the perusal of every attentive and discerning person in the United States, and I ask unanimous consent at this point to have printed in the RECORD the pertinent features of that able address which my colleague delivered showing the necessity for a tariff on copper.

There being no objection, the address by Senator HAYDEN was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AN ADDRESS ON THE NECESSITY FOR A TARIFF ON COPPER BY SENATOR CARL HAYDEN, BEFORE THE GLOBE CHAMBER OF COMMERCE, GLOBE, ARIZ., TUESDAY, JUNE 16, 1931

It would be a waste of effort to present arguments here to show why a tariff on copper is now needed. Every well-informed person in Arizona knows that all of our mines which produce the red metal are either shut down or operating at greatly reduced capacity, that miners are out of work, that the flow of money which was distributed from the mining camps throughout the State has about ceased.

There is no need to tell the story of our distress to men and women who are already feeling its effects. The place to make such a plea is before those who have power to remedy our plight, the United States Tariff Commission, which can officially find the facts, and before the Congress, which can act after the facts are thus formally established. It is, therefore, my purpose to confine these remarks to a plain statement of what has thus far been accomplished, what is now being done, and what remains to be achieved if copper is to be given equal treatment with other metals and manufactures under the national customs laws.

The first question that naturally arises is why copper, as a raw material, does not now enjoy at least some protection from foreign competition. The answer is that for more than a generation no one with authority to speak for the industry has asked for a tariff while tariff bills have been under consideration by Congress.

I have taken part in three general revisions of the tariff. I was a Representative in Congress when the Underwood-Simmons Act of 1913 was passed in the Wilson administration and the Fordney-McCumber Act was passed in the Harding administration. As a Senator I was present during more than a year that the Hawley-Smoot bill was under discussion before President Hoover gave that measure his approval.

At no time when any of these bills were being formulated did any witness appear in person before the Committee on Ways and Means of the House or the Finance Committee of the Senate and ask for a tariff on copper. These are the committees which actually make tariff bills, yet no one even took the trouble to mail in a brief to be included in the record suggesting that Congress grant protection to copper mined in the United States.

There were two controlling reasons for this entire lack of interest. The price of copper from 1912 to 1929 was fair and for a part of the time exceedingly high. Consequently there was no general incentive to seek a better price. So far as the Underwood law is concerned, if a tariff had been granted, it would have had no effect because the World War dominated all markets and the normal courses of trade were set aside. Raw wool was on the free list, yet war prices prevailed.

The second reason was that during all the 16 years following 1913 the United States was producing more copper than could be consumed in our own country. It is axiomatic that an import duty can not affect the internal market value of any commodity the surplus of which must be exported. In all such cases the amount received abroad fixes the price at home. Perfect proof of this is found in the drop in the price of wheat, of which the United States produces a surplus, from $1.25 to 60 cents a bushel, notwithstanding that there exists an import duty of 42 cents a bushel. Such tariffs are political, not practical.

The tariff is a tax. Congress does not impose tax burdens unless reasons are advanced for doing so. It is indeed a rare industry that has ever been given the advantage of tariff protection without asking for it. Personally I know of no such instance.

The only way that an import duty beneficial to any commodity can be secured is for those interested to make and present a case that justifies their request. The industries that have benefited most by the protective-tariff system have not allowed modesty to interfere with their demands. Silence is unknown to them when tariff legislation is pending in Congress.

The tariff is a tax. But import duties have been levied by Congress under each and every kind of political administration from the very beginning of the American Government. This source of revenue will, no doubt, continue to be utilized until long after we who live to-day have passed away. There never was a tariff bill enacted by Congress which did not have some measure of protection in it, either intentional or incidental. Therefore, it is vain to oppose all tariffs unless one is willing to say that no such kind of a tax can be justified.

The American people do not want to be robbed, but the great mass of them have no objection to paying a fair price for what they buy. Eight cents is an unfair price for copper. It can not be produced at that figure and allow those who mine it to live under the same standards of comfort and decency as other Americans. If, by levying an import duty, the price can be raised to a fair level so that the industry may prosper, the consuming public in the United States will not protest against such a tax.

We should approach the consideration of a tariff on copper neither as rabid protectionists or rank free traders. Protection gone mad, as in the case of the Hawley-Smoot Act, injures the industries of the country as a whole and when all are suffering that part represented by the production of copper must of necessity also suffer. The present tariff wall has been built so high that goods which Americans produce for export can not be paid for in other goods from nations who would otherwise be our best customers. The balance of trade has been so disturbed that the scales can not be righted and our home market is glutted with goods that would normally have gone abroad.

Absolute free trade, upon the other hand, is neither to be expected nor desired. The American market, which is the greatest in the world, should not be made the dumping ground for commodities produced in all parts of the earth, without regard to decent living conditions, by labor greatly underpaid and sometimes working on terms that approach so near to slavery as to be indistinguishable from it.

Let me also repeat that there always has been and probably always will be revenue collected at the customhouses on imported goods. Revenue can not be raised from any imported article, of which enough is not produced in the United States to supply the domestic demands, without automatically granting protection to those who produce it here. Favors of this kind should be extended equally. If there is to be a duty on clothes, there should also be a duty on the wool of which the cloth is made. The purpose of all that I have said is to prove that nothing is to be accomplished by going to extremes either toward protection or free trade.

The sane and common-sense way to remedy the crisis which now confronts the American copper-mining industry is to agree, first, that all imports of copper are just as legitimate a source of revenue as any other commodity which a ship can bring to our shores; and, second, that if any other product of labor in the United States is to be given the advantage of protection from foreign competition, then copper is entitled to the same measure of benefit. This rule is and should be applicable regardless of what theory the makers of a tariff bill may have in mind as a justification for its enactment.

I am no recent convert to this doctrine. In the National Capitol I have successfully argued that it should apply to long-staple cotton and dates produced in southern Arizona; to the raw wool, the cattle, and the hides of our stockmen; to activated clay in the northern part of our State. The same reasoning was advanced, but not with the same success, in the support of import duties on the crude asbestos of Gila County, the sodium sulphate of the Verde Valley, on manganese and strontium ores, and other products of our State, where discrimination was evident. No one, therefore, can charge me with inconsistency in now saying that the copper which comes from the mines and smelters of Arizona must be considered on a parity with every other product of American industry.

I did not urge that a copper tariff be adopted while the Hawley-Smoot Act was in the making, because it would have been futile to do so. Eighteen-cent copper could not be used as an argument that the industry was depressed and suffering from foreign competition. The price of copper did not drop below 18 cents a pound until after the tariff bill had passed both the House and Senate and was no longer subject to amendment.

It is now generally recognized that pegging the price of copper at 18 cents was an economic mistake which had at least three distinct disadvantages: First, overproduction in the United States was encouraged until a surplus of copper was accumulated which the country could not consume. Next, the development of new mines in Africa and elsewhere, which the world does not need, was speeded up. Lastly, that price effectively stood in the way of any organized effort to obtain a tariff while the Hawley-Smoot bill was under consideration by Congress. The opportunity to secure an import duty in that legislative measure was thus lost.

It goes without saying that Senator ASHURST, Congressman DOUGLAS, and I will welcome the active aid and assistance of any delegation that may come to Washington next winter authorized to appear before the committees in behalf of a tariff on copper. Without that kind of help we will be greatly handicapped. Such is not only the usual but the proper way to present a request for a revision of the tariff. We shall see that those from Arizona who desire to appear as witnesses have an opportunity to be heard if any hearings at all are granted.

I believe that the best way to proceed is to seek the enactment of a special act which will fix an import duty on copper. I have always said that every tariff schedule should be considered on its own merits, irrespective of every other rate which may be proposed. Logrolling is abhorrent. The practice of trading votes is of long standing, but now there is a greater sentiment than ever in Congress against it.

I shall urge the passage of a separate bill or joint resolution based upon the findings of the Tariff Commission with respect to copper. I shall do everything possible to insist that the duty on this one product be discussed and acted upon without regard to politics; that merit alone shall determine the measure of relief which shall be granted.

The next complete revision of the tariff will be generally downward, but that does not mean that some rates will not be raised. The demand will be for an equalization of benefits, not the abolition of all duties. Senators and Congressmen are usually fair-minded and want to do what is right. If the case for copper is properly prepared, if the truth is made obvious, I have every confidence that Congress will do justice to Arizona's greatest industry and grant an equitable import duty—I hope, by a special act, but in any event as a part of some more general bill.

I believe that those who mine copper in Arizona and elsewhere within the Union have an equitable claim for a tariff. If there is to be a tariff for one, there should be a tariff for all. The present injustice and discrimination—which, whether foreseen or not, undoubtedly exists—must be removed and copper placed upon a parity with other metals and commodities that now enjoy protection. The cause is so just that I have faith it will succeed. As a Senator from a State so vitally affected it is my duty, and as heretofore I shall take pride in performing that duty, to see that everything possible is done so that the present tariff law may be changed and relief granted to our copper-mining industry.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, last May, whilst I was accompanying the subcommittee of the Senate Committee on Indian Affairs on their visit to the various Indian reservations in Arizona—and I wish now to thank that subcommittee for the able work they did during their visit to Arizona—I, when in the field, received a telegram inviting me to attend a conference called by Governor Hunt, of Arizona, to discuss a copper tariff. The governor's telegram to me was as follows:

I cordially invite you to attend and to participate in the copper tariff conference called by me at the house chambers, Capitol Building, Phoenix, Monday, May 11, at 2 p. m.

As I said before, I was in the field when I received this telegram, and no stenographer and no typewriter were, for the moment, available. I preserved, however, as is my habit, the notes which I then made of a message I sent in reply to the governor's invitation.

In order that the clerk may be spared the task of attempting to decipher my somewhat illegible handwriting, I shall myself now read from my original notes my reply to the governor's telegram:

Hon. GEORGE W. P. HUNT,
Governor of Arizona:

Your telegram received. Please accept my congratulations upon your vigor and vision in calling the copper tariff conference. It is the birthright of every American citizen to have an opportunity to earn a livelihood and it is the duty of governments, national and State, to take measures that will offer and afford to citizens a fair and reasonable opportunity to earn such livelihood. Our copper-producing industry must not be allowed to languish, for when this prime industry suffers a serious decline in the price of its output not only the producers but also all other citizens of the State are distressed either directly or indirectly.

With assurances of my continued advocacy of a proper tariff on copper.

Sincerely yours,
HENRY F. ASHURST.

In conclusion I wish to say that we shall at the proper opportunity offer to such bills as will be found to be eligible, amendments providing for a tariff on copper. Permit me further to say that my colleague [Mr. HAYDEN], the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG], and the junior Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER] introduced a resolution which was adopted by the Senate calling upon the Federal Tariff Commission to set forth the facts respecting copper. The Tariff Commission, in obedience to that resolution, submitted its report, which was highly technical in character, but demonstrating to any man who will think into things instead of around things, that the copper industry will languish—indeed, will perish—unless there shall be imposed a tariff on copper.

The able Representative in Congress from Arizona [Mr. DOUGLAS] has introduced in the House of Representatives (in which particular body of Congress under the Constitution such legislation must originate) the appropriate resolution asking for a tariff duty on copper.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I want to confirm what the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] has said. I should like to state further that a tariff on copper at the time the last tariff bill was prepared was opposed by what I may say are the dominating copper interests of the United States. Conditions, however, have changed materially since that time. Enormous copper deposits have been opened up in Africa. They are not only what we term "porphyry deposits," which are the cheapest in the world to operate, but the grade of ore is very high, and labor there is exceedingly cheap. This copper is partially owned by a government, and that government owns railroads. It is operating those mines beyond the normal demand for the market at home and is dumping their copper into the United States under the ordinary theory under which dumping takes place—mass production and taking care of its railroads. It has been discovered now that, in the face of that particular character of competition, it is impossible for our copper mines to operate.

We have had duties on two metals, lead and zinc, by reason of conditions that justified them. This condition with reference to copper is of recent development, however. I am assured that the leaders in the House of Representatives—that body having the right to initiate revenue measures—are giving the matter very careful study, and, in my opinion, they will act.

Mr. ASHURST. I thank the Senator.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Arizona a question?

Mr. ASHURST. Certainly.

Mr. BINGHAM. May I say that I welcome him into the ranks of those who desire to protect the industries of their States? May I ask him also whether he will be willing, in case he secures that which he is attempting to get—namely, an adequate tariff on raw copper—to grant those who use it in the manufacture of articles into which copper enters a compensatory tariff?

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I thought that my 20 years of service here had demonstrated that I was a fair man, without having to be asked such a question.

Mr. BINGHAM. The Senator has always been fair.

Mr. ASHURST. I could never ask a privilege or a right and in the same breath deny to others that same right. Certainly I should be happy to do so.

Mr. BINGHAM. I am delighted. I thank the Senator.

Mr. ASHURST. Does the Senator desire to ask me another question?

REORGANIZATION OF GOVERNMENT

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an editorial appearing in the Lexington (Ky.) Herald of Saturday, February 20, 1932, entitled "The President's Plan for Reorganization of the Government."

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The editorial is as follows:

THE PRESIDENTS PLAN FOR REORGANIZATION OF THE GOVERNMENT

It is just two weeks less than three years since Herbert Hoover took the oath as President of the United States of America. In the campaign that resulted in his election one of the main grounds upon which he and his advocates advised the American people to vote for the Republican ticket was that Mr. Hoover was a great engineer, a great organizer, and a great economist, and would reorganize and consolidate the departments of the Government so as to reduce expenditures.

During the first two years of his administration Mr. Hoover had an overwhelming majority in the House of Representatives and a decisive majority in the Senate. During those two years the expenses of the Government increased enormously. Not only was there no consolidation or reduction of commissions and bureaus, but an inexcusable and unjustifiable increase in the number of commissions and in the expenditures of the Government.

Income-tax returns for 1930 were made to the Treasury Department in March, 1931. Those returns revealed clearly that there would be a terrific decrease in the income of the Government. The result of those returns were tabulated by the Treasury Department and Mr. Hoover must have known the result within a short time after the returns were made.

The Secretary of the Treasury and the President ought to have known, and it must be presumed did know, what were the expenses of the Government. They ought to have known not later than the middle of April, 1931, that the country faced a deficit and that there was imperative need to cut expenses and increase the revenue of the Government unless that deficit was to amount to staggering figures.

The President did nothing to reduce expenses. Earnest efforts were made, urgent advice given to the President to call Congress into session so that it might take action. He refused to do so. Misleading and erroneous estimates of the deficit faced by the Government were issued by the Secretary of the Treasury. In spite of the deficit that faced the Government, that now amounts to over a billion and a half dollars, in defiance of the urgent pleading of business men, economists, bankers, and politicians, the President refused to call Congress into session or to take any action to reduce expenditures so as to bring the expenses in line with the income.

Congress met, as provided by the Constitution, in December, 1931. The Democratic majority in the House of Representatives and the Democrats in the Senate fulfilled the forecast made by the leaders of the Democratic Party after the election of 1930, that they would give prompt support to every measure proposed that was for the good of the country and would not let any partisan purpose control their action. They united in the approval of the moratorium that President Hoover had declared in June without authority and without calling Congress together. They passed the act creating the Reconstruction Finance Board, modeled as it was after the War Finance Board organized under a Democratic President by a Democratic Congress, which President Hoover and his advocates adopted as a method of relieving the desperate distress of the country. They gave conclusive proof of the fact that had the President called Congress together last April, as he should have done, there would have been prompt action taken to relieve the depression. The Democrats put country above party and supported every proper recommendation made by the President in spite of the fact that Mr. Hoover has shown petty and persistent partisanship, even vetoing the Wagner law because it was sponsored by a Democrat.

The Democratic majority of the House made plans to have a survey made of the operations of the Government and report a plan for reorganization that would lead to greater economy and greater efficiency.

Now, President Hoover, who during the two years when his party had absolute control of the Government took no step to have the Government reorganized and expenses decreased, sends a message to Congress proposing and urging a reorganization of the Government.

It is evidently a hastily prepared, ill-considered plan, lacking in definite recommendation or in any evidence of consideration for the benefit of the public. Judging from the accounts published in the newspapers, the plan proposed by the President is not only ill-considered and ill-advised but contains the possibility of sinister purpose.

After three years, during two of which he had complete control of Congress, the President's message now can be accepted only as an effort to prevent the reorganization of the Government for the benefit of the people as a result of the plans of the Democrats who are in control of Congress.

The President truly says:

"The need for reorganization is obvious."

It was just as obvious during the compaign of 1928. It is no more obvious now than it has been every day since President Hoover took the oath of office. But he did nothing to bring it about while his party was in control.

President Hoover says further:

"In the present crisis the absolute necessity for the most drastic economy makes the problem one of paramount importance."

That is true. But there was just as much need for drastic economy in 1930 and 1931 as there is in 1932. All intelligent persons recognized the need for drastic economy by the Government after the income-tax returns for 1930 were made last March. Why did the President not call Congress in session then and have these drastic economies put into effect?

Upon receipt of the message Speaker GARNER properly pointed out that the Democratic Party had sponsored a survey to determine what bureaus and commissions could be eliminated and called attention to the fact that the President's message contained no definite recommendation for abolishing any specific Federal activity in the interests of economy.

Mr. Hoover is so obsessed with the desire to be reelected that every act he does, every word he utters, seems prompted by the thought of how he can best assure his nomination and secure a reelection.

His nomination, of course, depends upon the machine of Federal officeholders. According to reports from Washington, he opposes a reduction in the salaries of Federal officeholders for fear that they might not perform according to his wishes in the State conventions that send delegates to Chicago.

From the summary of his message published in the newspapers, if his recommendations were followed, there would be additional Federal officers with additional power to aid his ambition to be renominated and reelected. The most careful examination of his message possible from the synopsis so far published in the papers available indicates clearly that there are other motives than the reduction in expenditures and service to the public that prompted the message.

We have approved the action of the Democrats in passing the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and the Glass-Steagall bills. We indorsed his effort to stop hoarding and put idle dollars to work. We would approve any action taken by the President or anyone else that would be of service. But we hope every Democrat in Congress will rebuke by his vote the palpable effort of the President to take political advantage of the present dire circumstances to have a reorganization of the Government that would inure to the benefit of the Republican Party without benefit to the country.

We have the same faith in the statements made by the President in this message as we have in his statement made August 11, 1928, when in recommending himself for the Presidency he said:

"Unemployment, in the sense of distress, is widely disappearing. We in America to-day are nearer to the final triumph over poverty than ever before in the history of any land. The poorhouse is vanishing from among us. We have not yet reached the goal, but given a chance to go forward with the policies of the last eight years, and we shall soon, with the help of God, be in sight of the day when poverty will be banished from this Nation."

Any statement by the President now is entitled to the same confidence as the statement by Mr. Hoover on September 17, 1928:

"When we (the Republican Party) assumed direction of the Government in 1921 there were five to six million unemployed men upon our streets. Wages and salaries were falling and hours of labor increasing. The Republican administration at once undertook to find relief to this situation. At once a nation-wide employment conference was called. Within a year we restored these 5,000,000 workers to employment. But we did more; we produced a fundamental program which made this restored employment secure on foundations of prosperity."

There is just as much reason to have confidence in the verity of any statement made by Mr. Hoover now as there is in his statement made October 25, 1929:

"The fundamental business of the country, that is production and distribution of commodities, is on a sound and prosperous basis."

As Patrick Henry said, the only lamp to guide one is the lamp of experience, so the standard to measure the accuracy and verity of statements by any man is his past record. A statement by President Hoover to-day as to the purpose and the effect of his recommendations may be judged by the accuracy of his statement made May 1, 1930, at the annual dinner of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States, when he said:

"While the crash only took place six months ago, I am convinced we have now passed the worst and with continued unity of effort we shall rapidly recover."

Any statement made by Mr. Hoover, any message sent to Congress by him should be scrutinized and the effect of his recommendations determined in the light of his past record and his present obsession for renomination and reelection. If he makes a recommendation that, after examination, is believed to be good for the country, the Democrats in Congress should support it whole-heartedly. If he makes such recommendations as he does in his special message, they should be rejected absolutely.

EFFECT OF IMPORTS OF PULP AND PAPER

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I have before me a copy of the Pacific Pulp and Paper Industry of the issue of February, 1932, containing an article which is headed "47,000 Jobs—The Paper Industry's Chief Export." I ask unanimous consent that the article may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FORTY-SEVEN THOUSAND JOBS—THE PAPER INDUSTRY'S CHIEF EXPORT

(The value of an industry to a nation is the ability of that industry to provide employment for the citizens of the nation. When imports are encouraged that deprive workmen the opportunity of fabricating domestic resources into needed commodities, then the industry permitting such imports is not fulfilling its place in national economy.)

The paper industry of the United States is one of the Nation's chief exporting industries. It exports annually something like 250,000,000 good, solid dollars worth 100 cents each, and, in addition, full-time year-around jobs for 47,000 American citizens willing and anxious to work.

Our world's largest gold reserve reposing in the bank vaults of the Nation tells us that we can more or less snap our fingers at an annual export of a quarter of a billion dollars, but 47,000 full-time jobs! There's an item, particularly in these times when countless agencies are scratching their heads for ways and means of reestablishing the severed connections between men and pay rolls.

Let us inquire into this. It may be that the prestige which the industry holds as an exporter is only a shell without the oyster.

In terms of round averages prevailing in the two years immediately preceding the great headache, the paper industry of the United States shopped around in foreign markets and bought 1,500,000 cords of pulpwood, 1,800,000 tons of wood pulp, and 2,400,000 tons of paper. The figures are in terms of annual purchases. For these commodities the United States sent over its boundaries $15,000,000 for the wood item, $85,000,000 for the pulp item, and $150,000,000 for the paper item. In all, that's $250,000,000.

There is nothing new about these figures. They have been growing upon us for 20 years, but the growth has been reasonably steady. The condition has come upon us as fat comes upon a man. He realizes he is getting a little heavy, but he disregards the condition, until some day he steps on the scales and the doctor suddenly brings his degeneration into sharp relief.

Those 47,000 jobs! Aren't they rather intangible?

Not at all. Take the item of 1,500,000 cords of wood. The trees must be severed at the stump, barked, cut to length, and otherwise processed before they are acceptable as pulpwood at the mill. It takes a lot of labor to dress up 1,500,000 cords of wood during the year; enough labor, in fact, to keep 5,000 men busy for the 12 months doing nothing else. The 5,000 men who are now cutting this item of wood are not Americans receiving American dollars in pay and recirculating those dollars in American channels of trade.

Take the item of 1,800,000 tons of wood pulp. It requires 3,300,000 cords of pulpwood to fill the order. Once more workmen other than Americans go out into the timber with axe and saw, and it will take 11,000 men the entire year to cut enough wood to fill the pulp order.

In this case the wood is not to be exported in the raw. The foreign manufacturers have decided in this instance that they might just as well get some manufacturing profit out of the deal. They can send pulp into the United States market with no handicap of tariff, so why not? So, after 11,000 men have worked all year to cut wood for the foreign pulp mills, another crew of 6,000 men get busy and convert that stack of 3,300,000 cords of wood into 1,800,000 tons of pulp of different grades.

Let's see, now. So far we have established jobs for 22,000 men—jobs that will give them 300 days of employment in the year. And the calculations are only half finished.

Take the item of 2,400,000 tons of paper. This requires more wood. It will take something like 2,700,000 cords to fill this order. This will take more men, some 9,000 of them, and the job will take a full 12 months to do.

However, this new crew of 9,000 men will not be enough. The wood must be converted to pulp. So, if the order is to be filled, another 8,000 men must be put on the pay roll for the full year. This second crew merely performs the intermediary service of converting the pulpwood into something that can be put over the paper machines. They will not have any time to take care of the actual paper making. That last manufacturing step will require another 8,000 men.

The big order from the United States for all three items, pulpwood, woodpulp, and paper has now been filled. Checking back over all the crews of men necessary, we find that it has taken 47,000 men, working the full year, to perform the necessary direct labor, 47,000 foreign workmen taking the jobs of 47,000 American workmen.

To meet this foreign pay roll the paper industry sanctions the export of $250,000,000 annually. In distributing this sum to the 47,000 foreign workmen the per capita ratio works out to the tune of $5,300. Obviously, in terms of average wages, and particularly lower foreign wage scales, this ratio is too high, much too high.

The ratio engenders suspicion as to the correctness of the whole argument. Two explanations are open. First, the number of workmen employed by the paper industry in foreign lands may be grossly underestimated in this discussion. It is not presumed that the figures given, totaling 47,000 jobs, are absolutely correct. They are but averages. It is believed that they are sufficiently correct as indices. Only direct jobs are concerned.

The second explanation lies in an estimate of the other somewhat indirect services that must be employed. These, too, are services performed by foreign workmen, all of whom draw their pay out of that quarter billion gold dollar pool that annually flows across the United States borders.

What are these auxiliary services? To begin with, there are axes and saws needed in the woods. Some one must make these tools and get paid for the work. Inquiry has not been made, but it is much doubted if these axes and saws are made from American steel, originating with American ore. The 25,000 men needed to cut the total requirements of pulpwood do not deliver that wood. Transportation is necessary to get the wood to the mill, and this requires railroad cars, boats, horses, engines, services of many kinds, all of which must be paid for.

The 14,000 men making pulp in the mills can not do the job with their bare hands. They must have electric power, motors, pulpstones, buildings, digesters, control instruments, screens, chemicals, steam, wires, felts, and a host of items. Somebody has to manufacture or produce these requirements, and they must be paid for. Some portion of these necessaries may originate in the United States, requiring the employment of American workmen, but it is quite safe to say that the proportion is small. In any event, were the United States to produce the pulpwood, pulp, and paper now imported, that benefit would still accrue to American workmen.

The 8,000 men making paper in foreign mills to ship into the United States market must also have some tools to work with. They must have paper machines, steam, electric power, motors, pumps, instruments, pipe, wire, glue, office desks, time clocks, and many other things, all of which some one has to manufacture or produce and get paid for.

Then there's the item of transportation. Whether pulpwood, pulp, or finished paper, all commodities have to be moved from camp or mill to mill or consumer on the other end. Did you ever stop to figure the number of railroad cars, vessels, barges, and trucks that are required to move 1,500,000 cords of wood, 1,800,000 tons of pulp, and 2,400,000 tons of paper? Did you ever stop to figure how many men this transportation job would employ as railroad engineers, switchmen, freight agents, car repairmen, section hands, telegraph operators, tugboat captains, deckhands, stevedores, marine engineers, and cooks?

These auxiliary services of transportation and of supplying equipment and materials to the camps and mills provide jobs by the thousand. They are services that are closely allied to the primary jobs of cutting the wood, manufacturing the wood into pulp, and making the pulp and paper.

NOTE.—The jobs cited in this table are only those providing direct or primary employment in cutting pulpwood, working the pulp mill, or working the paper mill. No cognizance is taken here of auxiliary services such as transportation and equipment building, nor of the more indirect employment involved in providing the necessities and luxuries of life for this army of workmen.

However, the money used to pay the 47,000 primary workmen and the thousands of secondary workmen does not end its circulation here and then head again for American bank vaults. It continues to flow in a trade-building stream through these foreign lands to other men, who gain a livelihood by providing clothes and food and radios to the men who do the more direct jobs. But it would take a skilled economist with lots of time at his disposal to work out the complete foreign travel of those two hundred and fifty million American dollars. Right now there is neither time nor necessity to pursue that point further.

It is sufficient to know that the paper industry has exported 47,000 year-around, full-time primary jobs. It is sufficient to know that the $250,000,000 annually sent out of the country to purchase a necessity to our business and social life, a necessity that could be supplied in its entirety by American workmen and American materials, would provide a mighty fine nucleus for a substantial domestic trade ranging from apples to zinc paint.

CONCERTED ACTION LACKING

How is it that the paper industry has permitted 47,000 employees to be taken off the direct pay roll? The truth is that the paper industry was not exactly to blame at the beginning. Some "friends" of American industry, the newspaper publishers, one of whom was a brother to a President, succeeded in lifting the tariff walls sufficiently to permit the cream of the newsprint business and the wood-pulp business to flow to other lands—and come sweeping back in a destructive tidal wave. But it is also true to charge the industry with a lack of concerted action in reestablishing protection for all parts of the American paper industry when it became evident what chaos had been injected into the domestic industry when pulp and newsprint were left fully exposed to the inroads of foreign competition.

From the Bureau of Customs, Treasury Department, it is learned that wood pulp and printing paper were dutiable under the tariff acts of 1883 and 1909. Under the tariff act of 1913 wood pulp was permitted to enter free of duty, and the law was so worded that newsprint got in under the wire also.

A LITTLE HISTORY

Here is a little light on events of two decades past, taken from A History of Paper Manufacturing in the United States, 1690-1916 (pp. 316, 317, 318), by Lyman Horace Weeks:

"In 1907 agitation developed among newspaper publishers on account of the higher prices asked for newsprint. The Government was appealed to for prosecution of the so-called Paper Trust and for the repeal of tariff duties on paper and pulp. President Roosevelt in his annual message advocated the repeal of the duty on pulp provided an agreement could be secured with Canada that there should be no export duty on pulpwood from that Dominion. Nothing came from this immediately, but in 1910 consideration of a general trade reciprocity with Canada resulted in the appointment of commissioners of the two countries, who worked out a tentative agreement, which in January, 1911, was submitted to Congress by President Taft.

"In this agreement paper, pulp, and pulpwood were placed on the free list, except when they came from countries that had placed an export duty on them. At that time pulp came into the United States free of duty or with countervailing duties, pulpwood was free, and paper bore moderate duties. The reciprocity treaty passed Congress and was signed by the President, but it was rejected in the Canadian Parliament. One section of the measure was so framed that even with the refusal of Canada to accept the treaty as a whole pulp and paper valued at not over 2½ cents per pound were to come into this country free of duty. Thus our market was opened to all the pulp and paper producing countries of the world, and especially to Canada by reason of her nearness and abundance of pulpwood.

"The immediate effect of this legislation was to injure the trade in the United States, especially in sections contiguous to Canada, and to encourage paper manufacturing in that dominion.

"The Underwood-Simmons tariff bill of 1913 operated to repeal the section of the reciprocity act of 1911 that related to pulp and paper, but the burdens that the American industry complained of were not removed. Free entry was given to printing paper worth not more than 2½ cents a pound and a tax of 12 cents ad valorem was placed on print paper worth more than 2½ cents."

What is the answer? The tide of imports is rising. As American newsprint mills have been forced out of competition on news they have by necessity shifted to other grades and caused disruption to run like a wave down through other parts of the industry. Whenever the pulp price goes down the paper price goes down with it. No one is helped, not even the final consumer, for what advantage is it to this theoretical final consumer if his neighbor is out of a job and can buy nothing?

There is another point: Some one is certain to mention that there is much American capital invested in the paper industries of other lands. True. In fact, too true. But do these foreign investments employ American workmen, contribute in taxes to the United States Government, purchase American machinery and supplies manufactured or produced by American workmen, utilize domestic forests? They do not. Their chief contribution is toward unemployment in the United States. They are to a large degree responsible for the export of 47,000 primary jobs that might be held by American workmen.

STATEMENTS BY ADMINISTRATION ABOUT DEPRESSION

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I ask leave to have printed in the RECORD an article from the New York Democrat of the 20th instant on Statements Made About Depression by the Administration.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENTS MADE ABOUT DEPRESSION BY THE ADMINISTRATION

Here is a partial list of statements made by President Hoover and members of his administration since the stock market crash in October, 1929. A comparison with conditions as they have existed from time to time during this period of depression will show what value may be attached to these predictions and pronouncements.

They were recently published in the Webster (S. Dak.) Journal in the editor's column entitled "Apple Sauce":

October 29, 1929: "The fundamental business of the country is on a sound and prosperous basis."—Mr. Hoover.

November 3, 1929: "We have come to see more clearly that the stock market is not the principal barometer of business, and that our American prosperity is deeply and firmly rooted."—Doctor Klein.

November 4, 1929: "The only possible effect recent fluctuations in the stock market will have upon general business will be to curtail the buying power, especially of luxuries, of those who suffered losses in the market crash."—Secretary Lamont.

November 21, 1929: "There is no reason why business should not be carried on as usual."—Mr. Hoover.

November 24, 1929: "American business is healthy and vigorous and promises to be more so. The eager and loyal cooperation evidenced so splendid by American business men in their talks with the President is nothing less than a certificate of prosperity insurance."—Doctor Klein.

December 3, 1929: "We have reestablished confidence. Wages should remain stable. Industrial unemployment has been prevented."—Mr. Hoover.

December 4, 1929: Mr. Mellon estimated a Treasury surplus of $122,783,966 for the fiscal year. (Note: The fiscal year closed with a deficit of $903,000,000.)

January 1, 1930: "I have every confidence that there will be a revival of activity in the spring and that during the coming year the country will make steady progress."—Mr. Mellon.

"One may confidently predict a continuance of prosperity and progress."—Secretary Lamont.

"We are justified in feeling an abiding, if perhaps not an exuberant, optimism."—Doctor Klein.

January 10, 1930: "We are going to have some rough sledding, but the turn will come about March or April for the country as a whole."—Doctor Klein.

January 13, 1930: "Conditions are very satisfactory. The outlook is generally good."—Secretary Lamont.

March 8, 1930: "The crisis will be over in 60 days."—Mr. Hoover.

May 1, 1930: "We have now passed the worst."—Mr. Hoover.

May 19, 1930: "Business operations in the United States are about 6 per cent below what might be considered normal."—Secretary Lamont.

May 21, 1930: "If President Hoover accomplishes nothing more in all of his service to the Government, that one outstanding thing of his administration—no reduction in wages—will be remembered forever."—Secretary Davis.

May 21, 1930: "Normal conditions should be restored in two or three months."—Secretary Lamont.

May 21, 1930: "A healthy revival of business by the end of September may be expected."—Doctor Klein.

June 28, 1930: "We can look for reasonable prosperity within the next year."—Secretary Davis.

August 8, 1930: "The mental and material resources of this great country of ours are already swinging us on the road to recovery."—Secretary Davis.

August 22, 1930: "The depression is rapidly drawing to a close."—Secretary Davis.

September 11, 1930: "I repeat that we have hit the bottom and are on the upswing."—Secretary Davis.

September 22, 1930: "Business on the whole has ceased its marked decline."—Secretary Lamont.

September 22, 1930: "We should be out of the depression by the end of October."—Doctor Klein.

October 2, 1930: "The depression is but a temporary halt in the prosperity of a great people. The income of a large part of our people has not been reduced."—Mr. Hoover.

October 4, 1930: "The end is approaching to this process of shrinking values."—Doctor Klein.

December 2, 1930: "There are many factors which give encouragement. We have already weathered the worst of the storm."—Mr. Hoover.

December 29, 1930: "During the opening months of the new year conditions will steadily improve all along the business front."—Doctor Klein.

December 31, 1930: "We have reached a point where cessation of further declines and beginning of recovery may be expected."—Secretary Lamont.

March 18, 1931: "There is pretty good evidence that an appreciable degree of recovery is in sight."—Doctor Klein.

April 29, 1931: "The corrective influences are at work and business is responding to the stimulus."—Secretary Lamont.

June 9, 1931: "The bottom of the depression was hit in January. We are now in a valley. The depression has ended. The valley usually runs across six or seven months. If history repeats itself, this means that in July up we go."—Doctor Klein.

THE JUNIOR SENATOR FROM OKLAHOMA, MR. GORE

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, I ask permission to have printed in the RECORD an article relating to my colleague entitled "The Broad Highway," by Charles Brooks Smith, published recently in the Wheeling (W. Va.) Intelligencer.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE BROAD HIGHWAY

By Charles Brooks Smith

WASHINGTON, February 18.—GORE, blind Senator, speaking, presents a miracle of the human mind. His a storage house of knowledge whose capacity can not be gaged. It pours out as he needs it in a fluent flow, never rising to the shrill of a torrent nor falling to the indistinguishable murmur of a drought-reduced brook. Each word fits into the sentence as though selected with a discrimination almost exquisite; as if it were especially ordered, shaded, weighed, and fashioned for a particular mosaic design.

He stands at his desk when he speaks, his right hand resting on his cane, the fingers of his left hand tapping the desk, an inaudible but noticeable gesture of emphasis. He throws his head back and his sightless eyes seem gazing at the line of skylight well above the high dais from which the Vice President looks down at the Senators. When his words are meant for some particular Senator or group, he swings round in their direction. Should a colleague arise to request him to "yield," he seems to know it by some uncanny sense. He will turn in the direction of the colleague, pause, it seems seconds, before the "Will the Senator yield?" is spoken.

It is a most astounding exhibition of mystery, hinting of supernatural and psychic forces—and it is "creepy."

HUMOR, SATIRE, SERIOUSNESS

The blind GORE is master of a mild humor which ripples along like the laughter of a child and a satire which is effective without sting. For instance, he said, "A suggestion has been made that the amount be increased to a billion dollars. Why not? It has even been intimated here, if I understood the course of debate, that a State should be allowed to replenish its treasury or to reimburse its own expenditures from the appropriations for these benevolent humanitarian objects. Why not? Unless that be done there is a danger that possibly some of this money might be left in the Treasury of the United States."

He moved to strike out of the Costigan-La Follette bill (now defunct) the words "money or commodities" and insert the words "food, fuel, and clothing."

"I believe," he said, "that all social workers recommend that food, fuel, and clothing, or orders on grocery stores be given instead of giving money outright. * * * I have had this incident called to my attention by a person who was, I believe, on the welfare board in Detroit. There they issued checks or gave money, as I understand, and one individual who was arrested for speeding turned in his relief check in part payment of his fine.

"That showed a great deal of ingenuity, thrift, and adaptation to circumstances, showing that he could meet occasions as they arose."

Here is a sample of his serious vein—delivered with a dramatic reading which lost nothing of its studied effect, because it was restrained and subdued, which is the opposite of the popular school of dramatics in Congress which teaches cracking the ceiling and splitting the eardrums:

"So we have seen illustrated here the dangerous tendency of this kind of legislation (so-called 'dole'). I do not know what governors have overwhelmed the Senate with their requests for Federal charity. It seems to me that Senators are rather outrunning themselves to thrust this donation upon unsoliciting States. We begin here in a spirit of philanthropy and of charity. We will continue it under an imperious demand—I will not say duress—when the beneficiaries become organized. Senators know what I mean."

To see, to hear, this blind Senator arise during the consideration of a complicated measure and move to strike out in section blank, paragraph blank, line so-and-so, certain words, and to substitute in lieu thereof certain other words, is to feel the inexplicableness of mysterious ways and wonders; and to recall certain lines of Wordsworth—

"And when a damp
Fell round the path of Milton, in his hand
The thing became a trumpet; whence he blew
Soul-animating strains—alas! too few."

THE CALENDAR

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning business is closed. The calendar is in order.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that we proceed to the consideration of unobjected bills on the calendar under Rule VIII, and commence with Order of Business 213, which follows the last bill considered on the last call of the calendar.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The clerk will report the first bill on the calendar under the unanimous-consent agreement.

The bill (S. 2062) for the relief of Adam Augustus Shafer was announced as first in order.

Mr. KING. Let that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FESS in the chair). The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 2058) for the relief of William C. Rives was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 2059) for the relief of Albert Ross was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 2060) for the relief of Otto Schluter was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

HAROLD I. JUNE

The bill (S. 432) granting permission to Harold I. June to transfer to the Fleet Reserve of the United States Navy was considered by the Senate and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That Harold I. June, chief aviation pilot, United States Navy, shall, in recognition of the assistance rendered by him as an assistant to Rear Admiral Richard E. Byrd, United States Navy, in his nationally recognized record flight over the South Pole, be permitted to transfer to the Fleet Reserve of the United States Navy at such time as he may request, while he is serving in the regular Navy of the United States, and shall, after transfer in accordance with this provision, receive the same pay, allowance, or other compensation as is now or may hereafter be authorized by law for enlisted men of the United States Navy who are transferred after 16 years' service in the regular Navy of the United States.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I should like to have an explanation of this bill.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, this bill passed the Senate at the last session. It will be remembered that June was a member of Admiral Byrd's Antarctic expedition, and he desires to transfer to the Fleet Reserve. The Navy has no objection to it. The bill passed the Senate at the last session, but too late to be passed by the House.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BIG SANDY RIVER BRIDGE, WEST VIRGINIA AND KENTUCKY

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. NEELY. I address myself particularly to the senior Senator from Oregon [Mr. McNARY]. Will there be an opportunity to return to the beginning of the calendar to-day?

Mr. McNARY. Providing we conclude the call of the calendar. I could not say as to that; but if we finish the orders under the unanimous-consent agreement we will commence at the beginning of the calendar and go until the hour of 2 o'clock has arrived.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, Order of Business 160, Senate bill 2915, is a measure in which West Virginians are interested. This bill was passed over some time ago with the consent of its author, the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. HATFIELD], with the understanding that it would be taken up at an early date. I do not know my colleague's present wishes, but I suggest that, in the circumstances, he should be afforded an opportunity to pass his bill.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I was just asking the Senator from Oregon whether or not we will reach this bill to-day, and he assures me that we will. However, I shall be very glad to have the bill taken up at the present time, and ask the indulgence of the Senate for its immediate consideration.

I ask unanimous consent to take up Senate bill 2915, Order of Business 160, at the present time. It is a bridge bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from West Virginia?

There being no objection, the Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 2915) authorizing A. A. Lilly, M. B. Collinsworth, and A. E. Booth, their heirs, legal representatives, and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Big Sandy River at or near where it enters into the Ohio River, and between the cities of Kenova, W. Va., and Catlettsburg, Ky.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. This bill was passed by the Senate on February 5 and reconsidered on the same day. The question is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, I do not desire to object to the consideration of the bill at this time, but my colleague [Mr. BARKLEY], who is absent, requested me to make a statement in his behalf. He had taken up the matter with the State Highway Commission of Kentucky, and he thought he ought to follow the advice of that body. He received from the State highway commission a letter, which I ask to have read and printed in the RECORD as a part of these remarks.

I have no objection to make. I am making this statement because of the request of my colleague.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the letter will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

COMMONWEALTH OF KENTUCKY,
STATE HIGHWAY DEPARTMENT,
Frankfort, February 15, 1932.

Hon. ALBEN W. BARKLEY,
United States Senator, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Your telegram of February 10 was brought to the attention of the commission, and the commission again went on record as opposed to the granting of congressional permits to private parties or companies for constructing toll bridges across any streams within the State or any border streams.

Yours very truly,

STATE HIGHWAY COMMISSION
By BEN JOHNSON, Chairman.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, there is a committee amendment which ought to be adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment has been agreed to. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The bill was passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill authorizing A. A. Lilly, M. B. Collinsworth, and A. E. Booth, their heirs, legal representatives, and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the Big Sandy River at or near where it enters into the Ohio River, and between the cities of Kenova, W. Va., and Catlettsburg, Ky."

LOUIS SOLURI

The bill (S. 2242) granting six months' pay to Louis Soluri was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of the appropriation "Pay of the Navy, 1932," to Louis Soluri, father of the late Felix Soluri, seaman first class, United States Navy, an amount equal to six months' pay at the rate said Felix Soluri was receiving at the date of his death.

NELS D'ARCY DRAKE

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1096) for the relief of N. D'A. Drake, which had been reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to pay to Nels D'Arcy Drake, midshipman, United States Navy, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $4,000 in full satisfaction of all claims against the United States on account of injuries received in the line of duty, August 7, 1928, while serving on board the U. S. S. Florida.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I think there should be a brief explanation of this bill.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, this claimant was a midshipmen at the Naval Academy and was assigned to duty during the summer on the U. S. S. Florida. During that time he suffered an accident whereby he lost three of his fingers. The naval authorities conducted an examination, and found that he was physically incapacitated for continuation in the service. Thereupon he was dropped from the service on account of physical disability. This bill is to compensate him for the accident and injury and disability which he experienced while in the service on the U. S. S. Florida.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, what I am interested in is knowing whether or not this accident occurred in the line of duty. It might have occurred while he was in the service and not in line of duty.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President——

Mr. TRAMMELL. The chairman of the committee is present. He will tell the Senator the facts in that regard.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, this bill has already passed the Senate in the last session, and died in the House. It relates to the case of a midshipman who was on active duty on a battleship. An officer who has received an injury such as this man received would have been retired from the service on three-quarters pay; but this man, being a midshipman, had no such right, and there is no other way of taking care of his case.

The matter has been put up to the department, and they have suggested a remedy in the nature of a pension. The bill gives the man $4,000 to reimburse him for the injury.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill for the relief of Nels D'Arcy Drake."

BILL PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 2375) for the relief of Roscoe Meadows was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

ESTABLISHMENT OF NAUTICAL SCHOOL, NEW ORLEANS, LA.

The bill (S. 1470) providing a nautical school at the port of New Orleans, La., was considered by the Senate, and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Navy, to promote nautical education, is hereby authorized and empowered to furnish, upon the application in writing of the governor of the State, a suitable vessel of the Navy, with all her apparel, charts, books, and instruments of navigation, provided the same can be spared without detriment to the naval service, to be used for the benefit of any nautical school, or school or college having a nautical branch, established at the port of New Orleans, La., upon the condition that there shall be maintained at such port a school or branch of a school for the instruction of youths in navigation, steamship-marine engineering, and all matters pertaining to the proper construction, equipment, and sailing of vessels or any particular branch thereof.

SEC. 2. That a sum not exceeding the amount annually appropriated by the State of Louisiana or the city of New Orleans for the purpose of maintaining such a marine school, or school or the nautical branch thereof, is hereby authorized to be appropriated for the purpose of aiding in the maintenance and support of such school: Provided, however, That the appropriation for any one year shall not exceed $25,000.

SEC. 3. That the President of the United States is hereby authorized, when in his opinion the same can be done without detriment to the public service, to detail proper officers of the Navy as superintendent of or instructors in said school: Provided, That if said school shall be discontinued, or the good of the naval service shall require, such vessel shall be immediately restored to the Secretary of the Navy and the officers so detailed recalled: And provided further, That no person shall be sentenced to or received at said school as a punishment or commutation of punishment for crime.

SEC. 4. That all laws and parts of laws in conflict herewith are hereby repealed.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I should like to have that bill explained. I should like to have a statement of what the expense is likely to be.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Mr. President, an existing general law provides for the establishment of these schools. There are only four now. They are at Boston, New York, Philadelphia, and San Francisco. The law provides that the municipality or the State must pay one-half of the expense. There is no such school in the South, and the people of Louisiana have made provision for cooperating with the Government in the establishment of this school. There is a limitation here that the appropriation for any one year shall not exceed $25,000.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, while as a general rule I do not want to see bills passed that are liable to bring about increased appropriations, yet I recognize the importance of a school of this character, and also the interest in the subject of a community that is willing to put up half the expense. I remember that several years ago we sought to have schools of this kind established and, in fact, passed general legislation under which probably this school is proposed to be created. Considerable encouragement was given in different localities to the establishment of these schools, but it was not done; and some of those that were established were not continued. If a community is willing to put up its part of the expenditure with reference to a school of this kind at this time, I am not disposed to object to the bill.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, there is a nautical school in Boston. It is a very useful and very successful one, but my impression is that it is supported by the State government. I do not know how it was originally brought into being—whether it was through cooperation with the Federal Government or not.

Mr. BROUSSARD. I may inform the Senator that the report of the Secretary of the Navy states that there is such a school at Boston, established by the Federal Government under the existing general law. That is the one the Senator has in mind, I am sure.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Is the Senator proposing that the same action be taken in New Orleans that was taken in the establishment of this school at Boston?

Mr. BROUSSARD. Yes, sir.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Following the same precedent?

Mr. BROUSSARD. Absolutely, under the same law.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. The school at Boston has been very beneficial in training young men for nautical service.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ALLEGHENY FORGING CO.

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 466) for the relief of the Allegheny Forging Co., which had been reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and to insert:

That the Comptroller General of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to adjust and settle the claim of the Allegheny Forging Co. for steel ingots and steel billets shipped to Balboa, Canal Zone, under Panama Canal contract entered into in October, 1919, and to allow in full and final settlement thereof the sum of not to exceed $914.55. There is appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $914.55, or so much thereof as may be necessary for the payment of said claim.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I think there should be an explanation of the bill.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, the bill provides for the payment of certain steel shipped to Panama which complied with specifications, admittedly, and also the payment of an amount for steel which was shipped which the Government claimed was not in accordance with specifications.

The steel which the Government rejected as not in accordance with the specifications was sold by the Government to the highest bidder at Panama, and a very trivial amount was realized. The amount of the grant made by the bill is for the admitted amount due for the steel which was in accordance with the specifications, plus the amount realized by the Government at public sale of the steel which was rejected. The bill has the full approval, in its present form, of the Comptroller General.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LIABILITY TO INDIAN PUEBLOS

The bill (S. 2914) to authorize appropriations to pay in part the liability of the United States to the Indian pueblos herein named, under the terms of the act of June 7, 1924, and the liability of the United States to non-Indian claimants on Indian pueblo grants whose claims, extinguished under the act of June 7, 1924, have been found by the Pueblo Land Board to have been claims in good faith; to authorize the expenditure by the Secretary of the Interior of the sums herein authorized and of sums heretofore appropriated, in conformity with the act of June 7, 1924, for the purchase of needed lands and water rights and the creation of other permanent economic improvements as contemplated by said act; to direct the issuance of a patent to the Pueblo of Taos for certain lands described herein, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. BRATTON. Let that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over, on the suggestion of the Senator from New Mexico.

WAIVER OF PROSECUTION

The bill (S. 2655) providing for waiver of prosecution by indictment in certain criminal proceedings was announced as next in order.

Mr. BLAINE. Let the bill go over.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, this is an important bill. It seeks to effect a material change in procedure relating to criminal cases, and I think it should receive very careful consideration.

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, I will make a brief statement of the measure.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, I suggested that the bill go over.

Mr. BRATTON. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill goes over, under the suggestion of the Senator from Wisconsin.

MONTGOMERY BLAIR PORTAL

The Senate proceeded to consider the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 4) to provide for the naming of Montgomery Blair Circle, which had been reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia with amendments, on page 1, line 3, to strike out the words "the reservation intended for park purposes" and to insert in lieu thereof the words "Sixteenth Street and the adjacent park reservation"; on line 7, after the word "Blair," to strike out the word "Circle" and to insert in lieu thereof the word "Portal," so as to make the joint resolution read:

Resolved, etc., That the portion of Sixteenth Street and the adjacent park reservation lying within the District of Columbia at the intersection of Sixteenth Street, North Portal Drive, Eastern Avenue, and the District line, shall be known as Montgomery Blair Portal, in commemoration of the public service of the late Montgomery Blair, Postmaster General in the Cabinet of President Lincoln.

The amendments were agreed to.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "Joint resolution to provide for the naming of Montgomery Blair Portal."

INCORPORATION OF CREDIT UNIONS

The bill (S. 1153) to provide for the incorporation of credit unions within the District of Columbia was announced as next in order.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. President, with the consent of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CAPPER] I ask that this bill go over.

Mr. CAPPER. It will be agreeable to have the bill passed over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will go over on the suggestion of the two Senators.

J. G. SEUPELT

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 2982) for the relief of J. G. Seupelt, which was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the completion of the homestead entry of J. G. Seupelt on the Colville Indian Reservation authorized by the act approved April 14, 1924 (43 Stat. L. 1362), the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to make a new appraisal of the value of the property therein referred to and accept settlement therefor on the basis of such new appraisal as the appraised price of the said property.

THOMAS C. LAFORGE

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 4145) for the relief of Thomas C. LaForge, which was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BENJAMIN SPOTTEDHORSE AND HORSE SPOTTEDHORSE

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 4150) authorizing issuance of patents in fee to Benjamin Spottedhorse and Horse Spottedhorse for certain lands.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, in view of the fact that the Committee on Indian Affairs has been making a rather comprehensive study of Indian legislation, needed legislation, which study involves the question as to whether or not fee titles should be passed to the Indians at this time, I ask the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. FRAZIER], chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs, whether this bill, in his judgment, should be enacted into law.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, this is a House bill. It was recommended by the Secretary of the Interior and is a so-called administration bill. It simply provides that these Indians be given patents in fee in order that they may sell the land affected so they may improve other lands which they now control, own, and operate. They are considered to be the best farmers on their reservation and are doing exceptionally good work, according to the department. There was no objection to the bill in the committee.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the Senator knows, of course, that in many instances where the title has passed to the Indians without restriction, through the exploiting of the white men the Indians have been deprived of their lands. I have many cases brought to my attention where the white men have obtained deeds to the property just as soon as the patents passed to the Indians, as soon as their title ripened, without proper consideration. It does seem to me, in view of the fact that the committee is making a comprehensive study of the question as to whether or not title should pass to the Indians, and, if so, what restriction should be imposed, that measures of this kind ought to be passed with considerable reluctance. There ought to be some hesitation about it.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, I agree with the Senator in opposition to anything like a general grant of patents in fee to the Indians. As the Senator from Utah has stated, there are many cases in which there has been great injustice to the Indians. But from the information we have, this seems to be an exception to the general rule, and I believe the bill is proper and should be passed.

Mr. KING. I accept the judgment of the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CAPT. JACOB M. PEARCE

The bill (S. 1003) for the relief of Capt. Jacob M. Pearce, United States Marine Corps, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

GEORGE EDWIN GODWIN

The bill (S. 1009) for the relief of George Edwin Godwin was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

MEDAL OF HONOR TO THE LATE HENRY CLAY DREXLER AND GEORGE ROBERT CHOLISTER

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 2200) to authorize the presentation of a medal of honor posthumously to the late Henry Clay Drexler, which had been reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs with amendments, on page 1, line 5, after the word "Navy" and the comma, to strike out the words "for his heroic action in endeavoring to submerge a charge of powder in an immersion tank on the occasion of a fire in the forward turret of the U. S. S. Trenton, wherein he met his death in a supreme effort to save his shipmates," and to insert in lieu thereof the words "and the late George Robert Cholister, boatswain's mate, first class, United States Navy, for their heroic action in endeavoring to submerge a charge of powder in an immersion tank on the occasion of a fire in the forward turret of the U. S. S. Trenton, wherein they met their death in a supreme effort to save their shipmates," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President is authorized to present, in the name of Congress, a medal of honor, posthumously, to the late Henry Clay Drexler, former ensign, United States Navy, and the late George Robert Cholister, boatswain's mate, first class, United States Navy, for their heroic action in endeavoring to submerge a charge of powder in an immersion tank on the occasion of a fire in the forward turret of the U. S. S. Trenton, wherein they met their death in a supreme effort to save their shipmates.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, I should like to say a word in explanation of this bill. It provides that a medal of honor, posthumously, shall be presented to the late Henry Clay Drexler, former ensign, United States Navy, by the President.

This young man graduated from Annapolis on June 5, 1924, and on the 4th day of October of the same year was assigned to the U. S. S. Trenton.

The records of the Navy Department show that 16 days later, on October 20, at 3.35 in the afternoon, while the Trenton was preparing to fire trial installation shots from the two 6-inch guns in the forward twin mount of that vessel two charges of powder ignited. Twenty men were trapped in the twin mount. Four died almost immediately and 10 later from the burns and inhalation of flame and gases. The six others were severely injured.

Ensign Drexler, without thought for his own safety, on seeing that the charge of powder for the left gun was ignited, jumped for the right charge and endeavored to put it in the immersion tank. The left charge burst into flame and ignited the right charge before Ensign Drexler could accomplish his purpose. He fell on the spot where he was making a supreme effort to save his shipmates. When found, Ensign Drexler was dead.

The matter was referred to the Navy Department, and the department on January 28, 1931, said this:

The purpose of this bill is to authorize the President to present, in the name of Congress, a medal of honor, posthumously, to the late Henry Clay Drexler, former ensign, United States Navy, for his heroic action in endeavoring to submerge a charge of powder in an immersion tank on the occasion of a fire in the forward turret of the U. S. S. Trenton, wherein he met his death in a supreme effort to save his shipmates.

The bill S. 5481, if enacted, will result in no additional cost to the Government.

In view of the above, the Navy Department interposes no objection to the enactment of the bill S. 5481.

Inasmuch as the heroic conduct of the late George Robert Cholister, boatswain's mate, first class, United States Navy, was almost identical with that of the late Ensign Henry Clay Drexler, United States Navy, on the same occasion and at the same time, the Navy Department suggests that his name be included in the bill S. 5481.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to authorize the presentation of a medal of honor, posthumously, to the late Henry Clay Drexler and the late George Robert Cholister."

INDIAN TRUST ESTATES

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1839) to authorize the creation of Indian trust estates, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs with amendments, on page 1, line 5, after the word "Indian," to insert the words "except members under the supervision of the Quapaw Indian Agency located at Miami, Okla"; on line 9, after the word "Interior," to insert the words "in Oklahoma"; on page 2, line 5, to strike out the words "That the trustee shall be located in the State or Territory of the residence of the Indian creating the trust or in which the lands from which such funds or property originated may be located"; on page 3, line 8, after the word "to," to insert the word "taxation"; on line 16, after the word "shall," to strike out the words "during the restriction period provided by law"; on line 21, to strike out the words "prior to the date of the expiration of the restriction period provided by law" and to insert the words "during the period provided in such trust agreement or contract," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to permit, in his discretion and subject to his approval, any Indian except members under the supervision of the Quapaw Indian Agency located at Miami, Okla., over the age of 21 years, having restricted funds or other property subject to the supervision of the Secretary of the Interior, in Oklahoma, to create and establish, out of the restricted funds or other property, trusts for the benefits of such Indian, his heirs, or other beneficiaries designated by him, such trusts to be created by contracts or agreements by and between the Indian and incorporated trust companies or such banks as may be authorized by law to act as fiduciaries or trustees: Provided, That no trust company or bank shall be trustee in any trust created under this act which has paid or promised to pay to any person other than an officer or employee on the regular pay roll thereof any charge, fee, commission, or remuneration for any service or influence in securing or attempting to secure for it the trusteeship in any trust.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized, upon the execution and approval of any trust agreement or contract as herein provided, to transfer, or cause to be transferred, to the trustee, from the individual restricted or trust funds or other restricted property of the respective Indian, the funds or property required by the terms of the approved agreement, and the funds or property so transferred shall in each case be held by the trustee subject to the terms and conditions of the trust agreement or contract creating the trust.

SEC. 3. That none of the restrictions upon the funds or property transferred under the terms of any such trust agreement or contract shall be in any manner released during the continuance of the restriction period now or hereafter provided by law, except as provided by the terms of such agreement or contract, and neither the corpus of said trust nor the income derived therefrom shall, during the restriction period provided by law, be subject to alienation, or encumbrance, nor to the satisfaction of any debt or other liability of any beneficiary of such trust during the said restriction period. The trustee shall render an annual accounting to the Secretary of the Interior and to the beneficiary or beneficiaries to whom the income for the preceding year, or any part thereof, was due and payable.

SEC. 4. That trust agreements or contracts executed and approved as herein provided shall be irrevocable except with the consent and approval of the Secretary of the Interior: Provided, That if any trust, trust agreement, or contract be annulled, canceled, or set aside by order of any court, or otherwise, during the period provided in such trust agreement or contract, the principal or corpus of the trust estate, with all accrued and unpaid interest, shall be returned to the Secretary of the Interior as restricted individual Indian property.

SEC. 5. If, after the creation and approval of any trust, it is found that said trust was procured in violation of any of the provisions of this act, it shall be the duty of the Attorney General to institute appropriate proceedings in the Federal courts for the cancellation and annulment of said trust by court decree, and upon decree of annulment and cancellation, which shall be at the cost of the trustee, and after accounting, but without the allowance of any fee, charge, or commission for any services rendered by the trustee, all funds held by the trustee shall be paid to the Secretary of the Interior as restricted funds, and the Federal courts are hereby given exclusive jurisdiction of all actions involving an accounting under any trust created under the provisions of this act, and all actions to cancel, annul, or set aside any trust entered into pursuant to this act.

SEC. 6. That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to make rules and regulations for the purpose of carrying into effect the provisions of this act, and that the trust agreements and the trusts under this act shall be subject to such terms and conditions as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I would like to have a brief explanation of the bill.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, this bill passed the Senate on a former occasion. We have in Oklahoma about 5,060 Indians who have vast sums of money to their credit. At the present time these moneys are being dissipated. Unfortunately, the Indians get into difficulty, suits of every kind and class are brought against them, and for some reason the Department of the Interior can not keep from paying those claims and judgments.

This bill merely authorizes the department to give an Indian the same privilege a white man enjoys, if he desires to create a trust, to put his money beyond the purview of suits and claims. There is nothing directory; it just gives the Indians that privilege.

The main thing is that in the event a trust is created, and for any reason thereafter it is broken, the money will revert to the Department of the Interior under restrictions.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, if this bill had been enacted into law, would it have prevented the transfer of a large amount of money from an Indian, under seductions of others, to some church or some charitable institution, which gift has recently been passed on by the courts, which, as I recall, have ordered the restoration of the money?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. The money would go back to the department. If for any reason the trust is broken, the money would revert to the custody of the department for further control and management.

Mr. KING. I was wondering if it would go further, and protect the Indians from the blandishments and wrongs of others in obtaining their money.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. That is the purpose of the bill. If it does not do that, it will not do anything. It is the purpose of the bill to protect the large estates in the hands of incompetent Indians, and permit the Indians to create trusts, to be handled by responsible companies, just as white men put their property in trust to protect their dependents.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendments of the committee.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SALE OF UNUSED INDIAN CEMETERY RESERVES

The bill (S. 3409) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to sell certain unused Indian cemetery reserves on the Wichita Indian Reservation in Oklahoma to provide funds for purchase of other suitable burial sites for the Wichita Indians and affiliated bands was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized, in his discretion, to advertise and sell to the highest bidder for cash, at not less than the appraised value, the following-described tracts of land on the Wichita Indian Reservation in Oklahoma: Southeast quarter southeast quarter, section 3, township 9 north, range 10 west, Indian meridian, in Oklahoma, 40 acres; and north half northeast quarter northwest quarter and southeast quarter northeast quarter northwest quarter, section 10, township 7 north, range 10 west, Indian meridian, in Oklahoma, 30 acres: Provided, That the proceeds derived therefrom shall be used by the Secretary of the Interior in purchasing suitable tracts of land more conveniently situated, which may be desired by the Wichita and affiliated bands of Indians for cemetery purposes.

BILL PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 2883) prescribing regulations for carrying on the business of lighter service from any of the ports of the United States to stationary ships or barges located offshore, and for the purpose of promoting the safety of navigation, was announced as next in order.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I do not want to object to the bill. I understand, I believe, what the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] is trying to accomplish by the bill. However, some navigation interests in my State have written to me about it. I have not had a chance to examine it carefully. I am sure we can adjust later on whatever differences there may be. For that reason I ask that it may be passed over at this time.

Mr. JOHNSON. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

I. L. LYONS & CO.

The bill (S. 1473) to authorize an appropriation for the relief of I. L. Lyons & Co. was considered. The bill had been reported from the Committee on Claims, with an amendment, on page 2, line 6, before the word "liquor," to insert the word "identical," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to I. L. Lyons & Co. the sum of $3,793.07 in full settlement of all claims against the Government of the United States by said company for certain liquors sold to it by order of the United States district court authorizing the marshal for the eastern district of Louisiana and the Customs Service, port of New Orleans, to make such sale, and which liquors were later found and held to be unfit for medicinal purposes and not salable by the said I. L. Lyons & Co. as permittee wholesale druggist.

SEC. 2. That the payment directed under section 1 of this act shall not be made until the identical liquor involved is surrendered to the Federal prohibition administrator at New Orleans for destruction. The liquor to be surrendered and returned for destruction is identified as follows: 269 gallons Old Lewis Hunter Rye whisky; 548.25 gallons Old Boone whisky; 233.25 gallons Cedar Brook whisky; 123.61 gallons Scotch whisky; 523.90 gallons wine; and 20.75 gallons assorted liquors.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, there certainly ought to be some explanation of the bill and why the Government should pay the claim.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Mr. President, the bill passed the House in 1930. At the last session the Congress adjourned before the Senate could act on the House bill.

Under orders of the Federal court, certain seized liquors were sold at auction. I. L. Lyons & Co. bought the liquors. After the sale had been made and subsequently thereto the Treasury Department ruled that the liquors could not be used for medicinal purposes and issued an order against the sale. Lyons & Co. had paid the United States Treasury for them and were not permitted to sell them. They have been for three years trying to get their money back from the Government.

Mr. JONES. Very well.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DELAWARE RIVER JOINT COMMISSION

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 41) granting consent of Congress to a compact or agreement between the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania and the State of New Jersey creating the Delaware River Joint Commission and specifying the powers and duties thereof was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

"(a) The operation and maintenance of the bridge owned jointly by the two States and the city of Philadelphia, as its interests may appear, across the Delaware River between the city of Philadelphia in the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania and the city of Camden in the State of New Jersey, including its approaches, and the making of additions and improvements thereto.

"(b) The effectuation, establishment, construction, operation, and maintenance of railroad or other facilities for the transportation of passengers across the said bridge, including extensions thereof to the vicinity of Race Street and Eighth Street in the city of Philadelphia, and to the vicinity of Carman Street and Haddon Avenue in the city of Camden.

"(c) The investigation of the necessity for additional means of communication between the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania in the vicinity of Philadelphia and the State of New Jersey opposite thereto, and between the ports of Philadelphia and Camden and the sea, and making of such studies, surveys, and estimates as may be necessary to determine the feasibility and cost of any such additional means of communication, whether the same be by bridge, tunnel, canal, or otherwise.

"(d) Cooperation with all other bodies interested or concerned with or affected by the promotion, development, or use of the Delaware River.

"(e) The procurement from the Government of the United States of any consents which may be requisite to enable any project within its powers to be carried forward.

"(f) The promotion of the Delaware River as a highway of commerce between Philadelphia and Camden and the sea.

"(g) The promotion of increased commerce on the Delaware River, both freight and passenger, and, for this purpose, the publication of such literature and the adoption of such means as may be deemed appropriate.

"(h) To study and make recommendations to the proper authorities for the improvement of terminal, lighterage, wharfage, warehouse, and other facilities necessary for the promotion of commerce on the Delaware River.

"(i) Institution, through the attorneys general of Pennsylvania and New Jersey, of or intervention in any litigation involving rates, preferences, rebates, or other matters vital to the interests of the ports of the Delaware River.

"(j) Any other functions which may be of mutual benefit to the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania and the State of New Jersey, in so far as concerns the promotion and development of the ports of Philadelphia and of Camden, and the use by commercial vessels of their facilities.

"ARTICLE II

"The commission shall consist of 16 commissioners, 8 resident voters of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, and 8 resident voters of the State of New Jersey, who shall serve without compensation.

"The first eight commissioners for the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania shall be the governor of the Commonwealth, the auditor general, the State treasurer, the mayor of the city of Philadelphia, and the four additional persons now serving as members of the Pennsylvania commission, existing by virtue of Act No. 338 of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, approved July 9, 1919 (Pamphlet Laws, 814), and acts amendatory thereof and supplementary thereto.

"The first eight commissioners for the State of New Jersey shall be the eight individuals now holding office, as members of the New Jersey Interstate Bridge Commission, existing by virtue of chapter 271 of the laws of said State of 1929, approved May 6, 1929, and acts amendatory thereof and supplementary thereto, which said eight individuals are hereby appointed by said State as such commissioners, who shall serve for their unexpired terms as members of the New Jersey Interstate Bridge Commission. Succeeding commissioners shall be elected by the legislature to serve for terms of five years.

"For the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, the governor, the auditor general, the State treasurer, and the executive head of the city of Philadelphia, in office at the time, shall always be members of the commission, and, in addition thereto, there shall be four members appointed by the governor, who shall be known as appointive members. Whenever a vacancy occurs in the appointive membership of the commission, the governor shall appoint a member to serve for a term of five years from the date of his appointment.

"For the State of New Jersey, whenever a vacancy in the office of commissioner shall occur, such vacancy shall be filled for the unexpired term by the legislature. If the legislature shall not be in session when the vacancy occurs, such vacancy shall be filled by the governor, and such appointee shall hold office until the legislature convenes.

"All commissioners shall continue to hold office after the expiration of the terms for which they are appointed or elected unless and until their respective successors are appointed and qualified, but no period during which any commission shall hold over shall be deemed to be an extension of his term of office for the purpose of computing the date on which his successor's term expires.

"ARTICLE III

"The commissioners shall have charge of the commission's property and affairs, and shall, for the purpose of doing business, constitute a board, but no action of the commissioners shall be binding unless a majority of the members of the commission from Pennsylvania and a majority of the members of the commission from New Jersey shall vote in favor thereof.

"ARTICLE IV

"For the effectuation of its authorized purposes, the commission is hereby granted the following powers:

"(a) To have perpetual succession.

"(b) To sue and be sued.

"(c) To adopt and use an official seal.

"(d) To elect a chairman, vice chairman, secretary, and treasurer, and to adopt suitable by-laws for the management of its affairs. The secretary and treasurer need not be members of the commission.

"(e) To appoint such other officers and such agents and employees as it may require for the performance of its duties, and fix and determine their qualifications, duties, and compensation.

"(f) To enter into contracts.

"(g) To acquire, own, hire, use, operate, and dispose of personal property.

"(h) To acquire, own, use, lease, operate, and dispose of real property and interests in real property, and to make improvements thereon.

"(i) To grant the use of, by franchise, lease, or otherwise, and to make charges for the use of, any property or facility owned or controlled by it.

"(j) To borrow money upon its bonds or other obligations either with or without security.

"(k) To exercise the right of eminent domain.

"(l) To determine the exact location, system, and character of, and all other matters in connection with, any and all improvements or facilities which it may be authorized to own, construct, establish, effectuate, operate, or control.

"(m) In addition to the foregoing, to exercise the powers, duties, authority, and jurisdiction heretofore conferred and imposed upon the aforesaid Pennsylvania Commission and upon the aforesaid New Jersey Interstate Bridge Commission, severally, or upon both of said commissions jointly, by the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania or the State of New Jersey, or both of the said two States; and

"(n) To exercise all other powers, not inconsistent with the constitutions of the two States or of the United States, which may be reasonably necessary or incidental to the effectuation of its authorized purposes or to the exercise of any of the foregoing powers, except the power to levy taxes or assessments, and generally to exercise, in connection with its property and affairs and in connection with property within its control, any and all powers which might be exercised by a natural person or a private corporation in connection with similar property and affairs.

"ARTICLE V

"If for any of its authorized purposes (including temporary construction purposes), the commission shall find it necessary or convenient to acquire any real property in the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania or the State of New Jersey, whether for immediate or future use, the commission may find and determine that such property, whether a fee simple absolute or a lesser interest, is required for public use, and, upon such determination, the said property shall be deemed to be required for a public use until otherwise determined by the commission, and, with the exceptions hereinafter specifically noted, the said determination shall not be affected by the fact that such property has theretofore been taken for or is then devoted to a public use, but the public use in the hands or under the control of the commission shall be deemed superior to the public use in the hands or under the control of any other person, association, or corporation.

"If the commission is unable to agree with the owner or owners thereof upon terms for the acquisition of any such real property in the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania for any reason whatsoever, then the commission may acquire such real property in the manner provided by Act No. 338 of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, approved July 9, 1919, and acts amendatory thereof and supplementary thereto, for the acquisition of real property by the aforesaid Pennsylvania commission.

"If the commission is unable to agree with the owner or owners thereof upon terms for the acquisition of any such real property in the State of New Jersey for any reason whatsoever, then the commission may acquire and is hereby authorized to acquire such property, whether a fee simple absolute or a lesser interest, by condemnation or the exercise of the right of eminent domain, either under and pursuant to the provisions of the act of the State of New Jersey, entitled 'An act to regulate the ascertainment and payment of compensation for property condemned or taken for public use' (revision of 1900, approved March 20, 1900), and acts amendatory thereof and supplementary thereto, or under and pursuant to the provisions of an act entitled 'An act concerning and regulating acquisition and taking of lands by the State of New Jersey, or any agency thereof; providing a procedure therefor, and the manner of making compensation for lands so taken,' approved April 21, 1920, and the various acts amendatory thereof and supplementary thereto.

"The power of the commission to acquire real property by condemnation or the exercise of the power of eminent domain in the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania and the State of New Jersey shall be a continuing power and no exercise thereof shall be deemed to exhaust it.

"The commission and its duly authorized agents and employees may enter upon any land in the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania or the State of New Jersey for the purpose of making such surveys, maps, or other examinations thereof as it may deem necessary or convenient for its authorized purposes.

"However, anything to the contrary contained in this compact notwithstanding, no property now or hereafter vested in or held by any county, city, borough, village, township, or other municipality, or port district shall be taken by the commission without the consent of such municipality or port district unless expressly authorized so to do by the Commonwealth or State in which such municipality or port district is located. All counties, cities, boroughs, villages, townships, and other municipalities, and all public agencies and commissions of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania and the State of New Jersey, notwithstanding any contrary provision of law, are hereby authorized and empowered to grant and convey to the commission upon its request, but not otherwise, upon reasonable terms and conditions, any real property which may be necessary or convenient to the effectuation of its authorized purposes, including real property already devoted to public use.

"The Commonwealth of Pennsylvania and the State of New Jersey hereby consent to the use and occupation by the commission of any real property of the said two States, or of either of them, which may be or become necessary or convenient to the effectuation of the authorized purposes of the commission, including lands lying under water and lands already devoted to public use.

"The term 'real property' as used in this compact, includes lands, structures, franchises, and interests in land, including lands under water and riparian rights, and any and all things and rights usually included within the said term, and includes not only fees simple absolute but also any and all lesser interests, such as easements, rights of way, uses, leases, licenses, and all other incorporeal hereditaments, and every estate, interest, or right, legal or equitable, including terms of years and liens thereon by way of judgments, mortgages, or otherwise, and also claims for damage to real estate.

"ARTICLE VI

phia the following sums out of moneys raised by said commission on its bonds or other obligations:

"(a) An amount equal to the moneys contributed by the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania toward the cost of acquiring property for and constructing said bridge and the approaches thereto, and expenditures incident thereto, with interest at the rate of 4 per cent per annum, such interest to be computed from the dates on which installments of such funds were paid to the Delaware River Bridge Joint Commission by the said Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, as shown by the records of its State treasurer, less, however, the amount returned to the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania from the net revenues of the bridge between July 1, 1926, and June 30, 1931, and less interest, at the rate of 4 per cent per annum, upon such amount computed from the dates of repayment to the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania.

"(b) An amount equal to the moneys contributed by the State of New Jersey toward the cost of acquiring property for and constructing said bridge and the approaches thereto, and expenditures incident thereto, with interest theretofore actually paid by the State of New Jersey or accrued upon the bonds issued by said State to borrow money to pay its share of the cost of acquiring property for, and construction of, said bridge and the approaches thereto, and all expenditures incident thereto, less, however, the amount returned to the State of New Jersey from the net revenues of the bridge between July 1, 1926, and June 30, 1931, and less interest at the rate of 4¼ per cent per annum, upon such amount computed from the dates of repayment to the State of New Jersey.

"(c) An amount equal to the moneys contributed by the city of Philadelphia toward the cost of acquiring property for and constructing said bridge and the approaches thereto, and expenditures incident thereto, with interest theretofore actually paid by the city of Philadelphia or accrued upon the bonds issued by said city to borrow money to pay its share of the cost of acquiring property for and construction of said bridge and approaches thereto, and all expenditures incident thereto, less, however, the amount returned to the city of Philadelphia from the net revenues of the bridge between July 1, 1926, and June 30, 1931, and less interest at the rate of 4¼ per cent per annum, upon such amount computed from the dates of repayment to the city of Philadelphia.

"(d) As soon as is practicable subsequently to July 1, 1931, the commission shall determine with the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, the State of New Jersey, and the city of Philadelphia the net amounts due to each, respectively, as of the 1st day of July, 1931, and from that date until the date of payment interest shall be paid by the commission to the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania at the rate of 4 per cent per annum and to the State of New Jersey and to the city of Philadelphia at the rate of 4¼ per cent per annum.

"(e) The amount payable by the commission to the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, as aforesaid, shall be paid to the State treasurer of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania upon a voucher signed and audited by said State treasurer, who is hereby authorized to consummate the said transaction. Upon the receipt of the proper payment each of said officials shall certify to the Delaware River Joint Commission that all moneys payable by the Delaware River Joint Commission to the Commonwealth, State, or city, as the case may be, have been duly paid.

"(f) Nothing herein contained shall be construed to affect, diminish, or impair the rights and obligations created by, or to repeal any of, the provisions of chapter 352 of the Laws of New Jersey of 1920, and chapter 262 of the Laws of New Jersey of 1924, and chapter 336 of the Laws of New Jersey of 1926, and chapter 33 of the Laws of New Jersey of 1927, and chapter 64 of the Laws of New Jersey of 1928.

"(g) Of the money paid to the State of New Jersey under the provisions of this agreement, there shall be paid to the sinking fund commission, created by the provisions of the foregoing statutes (chapter 352 of the Laws of New Jersey of 1920 and chapter 262 of the Laws of New Jersey of 1924), such sum or sums as said sinking fund commission may deem necessary to meet the then existing indebtedness and obligations set forth in said statutes, together with such interest and other charges as may be due or may grow due. The amount thus to be paid to the sinking fund commission shall be arrived at and determined by said sinking fund commission within 90 days after payment is made to the State of New Jersey pursuant to the provisions of this agreement. The moneys to be paid to and received by said sinking fund commission are hereby appropriated by the State of New Jersey and are to be used for sinking-fund purposes according to law.

"(h) No failure on the part of the commission to make the aforesaid payments to the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, to the State of New Jersey, or to the city of Philadelphia, shall affect, diminish, or impair the rights of the holders of any bonds or other securities or obligations of said commission, as security for which the tolls and other revenues of the said bridge may be pledged.

"ARTICLE VII

"Notwithstanding any provision of this agreement, the commission shall have no power to pledge the credit of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, or the credit of the State of New Jersey, or the credit of any county, city, borough, village, township, or other municipality of said Commonwealth or of said State, or to create any debt of said Commonwealth or of said State or of such municipality.

"ARTICLE VIII

"The commission is hereby authorized to make and enforce such rules and regulations, and to establish, levy, and collect (or to authorize by contract, franchise, lease, or otherwise the establishment, levying, and collection of) such tolls, rents, rates, and other charges in connection with the aforesaid existing bridge across the Delaware River, and any other properties which it may hereafter construct, erect, acquire, own, operate, or control, as it may deem necessary, proper, desirable, and reasonable, which said tolls, rents, rates, and other charges shall be at least sufficient to meet the expenses thereof, including interest and sinking-fund charges; and the commission is hereby authorized and empowered to pledge such tolls, rates, rents, and other revenues, or any part thereof, either presently received or to be received in the future, or both, as security of the repayment, with interest, of any moneys borrowed by it or advanced to it for any of its authorized purposes and as security for the satisfaction of any other obligation assumed by it in connection with such loans or advances.

"ARTICLE IX

"The Commonwealth of Pennsylvania and the State of New Jersey hereby covenant and agree with each other and with the holders of any bonds or other securities or obligations of the commission for which there may or shall be pledged the tolls, rents, rates, or other revenues, or any part thereof, of any property or facility owned, operated, or controlled by the commission (including the said bridge across the Delaware River and the facilities for the transportation of passengers across the said bridge), that (so long as any of said bonds or other securities or obligations remain outstanding and unpaid, and unless and until adequate provision is made by law for the protection of those advancing money upon such obligations) the Commonwealth and the said State will not diminish or impair the power of the commission to own, operate, or control said properties and facilities, or to establish, levy, and collect tolls, rents, rates, and other charges in connection with such properties or facilities.

"The Commonwealth of Pennsylvania and the State of New Jersey hereby covenant and agree with each other and with the holders of any bonds or other securities or obligations of the commission for which the tolls, rents, rates, or other revenues, or any part thereof, of the aforesaid existing bridge across the Delaware River shall have been pledged that the said Commonwealth and the said State will not authorize or permit the authorization of the construction, operation, or maintenance of any additional vehicular bridge or tunnel or any additional bridge or tunnel having railroad or other facilities for the transportation of passengers between the said Commonwealth and the said State over or under the Delaware River by any other person or body than the commission, within a distance of 10 miles in either direction from the said bridge measured along the boundary line between the said Commonwealth and the said State.

"ARTICLE X

"The bonds or other securities or obligations which may be issued by the commission for any of its authorized purposes, and as security for which there may be pledged the tolls, rents, rates, and other revenues, or any part thereof, of any properties or facilities owned, operated or controlled by the commission (including the aforesaid existing bridge across the Delaware River and the aforesaid facilities for the transportation of passengers across the said bridge), are hereby made securities in which all State and municipal officers and bodies of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania and State of New Jersey, all banks, bankers, trust companies, savings banks, saving and loan associations, investment companies, and other persons carrying on a banking business, all insurance companies, insurance associations, and other persons carrying on an insurance business, and all administrators, executors, guardians, trustees, and other fiduciaries, and all other persons whatsoever, who are now or hereafter may be authorized to invest in bonds or other obligations of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania or of the State of New Jersey, may properly and legally invest any funds, including capital belonging to them or within their control; and said bonds or other securities or obligations are hereby made securities which may properly and legally be deposited with and received by any State or municipal officer or agency of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania or the State of New Jersey for any purpose for which the deposit of bonds or other obligations, either of the Commonwealth or of the State, is now or may hereafter be authorized.

"ARTICLE XI

"The effectuation of its authorized purposes by the commission is and will be in all respects for the benefit of the people of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania and the State of New Jersey, for the increase of their commerce and prosperity, and for the improvement of their health and living conditions, and since the commission will be performing essential governmental functions in effectuating said purposes, the commission shall not be required to pay any taxes or assessments upon any property acquired or used by it for such purposes, and the bonds or other securities or obligations issued by the commission, their transfer, and the income thereof (including any profits made on the sale thereof) shall, at all times, be free from taxation within the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania and the State of New Jersey.

"ARTICLE XII

"The commission shall make annual reports to the Governors and Legislatures of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania and the State of New Jersey, setting forth in detail its operations and transactions, and may make such additional reports, from time to time, to the governors and legislatures as it may deem desirable.

The preamble was agreed to.

CLOSING UPPER WATER STREET, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 50) to authorize the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to close upper Water Street between Twenty-second and Twenty-third Streets, was considered. The bill had been reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia with amendments, on page 1, line 6, after the word "square," to strike out "62" and insert:

62: Provided, That the consent in writing of the owners of three-fourths of all private property on the south side of square 62 is first had and obtained.

On page 2, line 5, after the words "District of Columbia," to insert:

Provided further, That the said commissioners be, and they are hereby, authorized to enter upon said closed area at all times for the purpose of maintenance and repair of all existing sewers and sewer purtenances.

On page 2, line 19, after the word "area," to insert:

And in the construction of said building the said association shall take such steps as are necessary to insure the safety of existing sewers and sewer appurtenances.

And on page 3, line 3, after the words "Lincoln Memorial," to insert:

Provided further, That the design of the said association's building shall be such as to be approved by the National Commission of Fine Arts, and its use shall be limited to organizations and institutions serving American pharmacy on a nonprofit basis.

So as to make the bill read:

Resolved, etc., That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia are hereby authorized to close upper Water Street, between Twenty-second and Twenty-third Streets NW., lying north of Potomac Park and south of square 62: Provided, That the consent in writing of the owners of three-fourths of all private property on the south side of square 62 is first had and obtained; and upon the closing of said street between the limits named the Commissioners of the District of Columbia are authorized to transfer the land contained in the bed of said street to the Director of Public Buildings and Public Parks of the National Capital, as part of the park system of the District of Columbia: Provided further, That the said commissioners be, and they are hereby, authorized to enter upon said closed area at all times for the purpose of maintenance and repair of all existing sewers and sewer appurtenances.

SEC. 2. The Director of Public Buildings and Public Parks of the National Capital is authorized to transfer to the American Pharmaceutical Association such an area adjacent to the land owned by the said association, as shall be agreed upon between the association and the two commissions hereinafter named, so that the location and the setting of the association's building will conform to the plan prepared by the National Capital Park and Planning Commission and approved by the National Commission of Fine Arts for the treatment of that area, and in the construction of said building the said association shall take such steps as are necessary to insure the safety of existing sewers and sewer appurtenances: Provided, That the American Pharmaceutical Association agrees, contemporaneously with the above transfer to it, to transfer to the United States of America title to a strip of land owned by said association, 17 feet in depth along Twenty-third Street, for the purpose of widening said street as an approach to the Lincoln Memorial: Provided further, That the design of the said association's building shall be such as to be approved by the National Commission of Fine Arts, and its use shall be limited to organizations and institutions serving American pharmacy on a nonprofit basis.

The amendments were agreed to.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MRS. J. J. BRADSHAW

The bill (S. 3095) for the relief of Mrs. J. J. Bradshaw was considered. The bill had been reported from the Committee on Claims with amendments, on page 1, line 4, to strike out "Mrs.," and in the same line after the name "Bradshaw," to insert the words "and Addie C. Bradshaw," and, in line 9, to strike out the word "she" and insert "Addie C. Bradshaw," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to pay J. J. Bradshaw and Addie C. Bradshaw, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $897 in full settlement of all claims against the Government for hospital and medical expenses and physical pain and suffering due to an injury Addie C. Bradshaw received by being struck by a United States naval ambulance in the city of Norfolk, Va., on or about September 10, 1927.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I should like to have a brief explanation of the bill.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, this is a bill introduced by the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON]. It seeks to compensate Mrs. Bradshaw for injuries received by her in a collision between her husband's car, in which she was riding, and a naval ambulance. The evidence before the committee was that the collision occurred on the streets in Norfolk, Va., at an intersection where there were neither lights nor officer nor signals of any sort. It appears that the Navy ambulance was being driven at great speed over wet and slippery streets. The case was investigated by naval authorities and the driver of the naval ambulance was subjected to disciplinary action of some sort.

Mrs. Bradshaw was riding in the rear seat of her husband's car. She suffered very severe injuries and fractures. She was in the hospital for a month. She was confined to her bed in her own home for some three weeks thereafter under the care of a physician and a nurse. I think it perfectly clear that neither Mrs. Bradshaw nor her husband, who was driving the car, was at fault in any respect. I believe it is clear also that the driver of the ambulance was driving at an excessive and reckless rate of speed.

The item is made up of $397 for money paid out for medical services, and then there is an additional sum of $500 added for the pain and suffering endured by Mrs. Bradshaw.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill for the relief of J. J. Bradshaw and Addie C. Bradshaw."

Mr. JONES. I ask that the bill go over.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, will the Senator tell me what objection he has to the bill?

Mr. JONES. I have not had an opportunity to examine the bill fully. I am opposed to the creation of these special classes in this country. I understand that permission to receive decorations of this kind by members of the Army is no longer granted. I want an opportunity to examine the bill pretty carefully before I consent to its consideration. As a general rule, I am opposed to the accepting of foreign decorations.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On objection, the bill will go over.

Mr. JONES. I think the bill had better go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 3447) for the relief of John Stratis was announced as next in order.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I should like to have an explanation of the bill, but inasmuch as the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HOWELL] is not here I ask that it may go over. I know he is pretty careful about these bills, but I should like to have an explanation.

Mr. McNARY. May I state that the distinguished Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HOWELL] is absent on official business?

Mr. JONES. I think the bill had better go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, this is a very meritorious case. The bill was reported favorably at the last session.

The report of the committee discloses that Peter C. Hains, jr., was a captain in the Coast Artillery Corps, United States Army. He had enlisted in 1898 and this incident occurred in 1908. He had had 10 years of service in the Army—good, faithful, and efficient service in every way.

While he was a captain in the United States Army he shot and killed a civilian, William C. Annis, of New York, whom Hains charged with having debauched his wife while he, Hains, was absent on official duty, which business necessitated leaving Mrs. Hains and three small children at his home at Fort Hamilton, N. Y. Hains was tried for murder in a civil court of New York State, found guilty of manslaughter in the first degree, and sentenced to imprisonment in Sing Sing Prison for a minimum of 8 years and a maximum of 16 years. On September 11, 1911, Gov. John A. Dix, of New York, granted Hains a full and complete pardon. On January 21, 1911, Hains submitted to the President his unconditional resignation from the Army.

It was held technically later on that although his resignation was unconditional and was accepted, yet under the practice in the department or the rules or the law the department considered that it was a discharge without honor. That was a rather technical finding. At any rate, the governor's pardon is set out in the report of the committee. Hains was granted a full and complete pardon for the offense which he committed, the killing of a man who had debauched his wife in his absence. In view of the fact that he was granted the pardon and then resigned voluntarily and unconditionally, I think it is perfectly clear that he ought not to have been held to have been discharged without honor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ROBERT E. EDGECUMBE

The bill (S. 2437) for the relief of Robert E. Edgecumbe was considered. The bill was reported from the Committee on Claims with amendments, on page 1, line 4, to strike out "Robert E. Edgecumbe" and insert "the estate of Annie Lee Edgecumbe, deceased," and, in line 7, to strike out the words "his wife," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to the estate of Annie Lee Edgecumbe, deceased, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $5,000 as full compensation for the death of Annie Lee Edgecumbe, on October 17, 1930, on account of having been struck by a United States Navy plane in Pensacola Bay, Fla.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill for the relief of the estate of Annie Lee Edgecumbe, deceased."

ALFRED G. SIMMONS, JR.

The bill (S. 2436) for the relief of Alfred G. Simmons, jr., was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Alfred G. Simmons, jr., out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $1,000 as full compensation for injuries received and suffered by him on account of having been struck on October 17, 1930, by a United States Navy plane in Pensacola Bay, Fla.

E. H. FLAGG

The bill (S. 816) for the relief of E. H. Flagg was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I ask the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCNARY], the author of the bill, if he has looked into this measure, and if it is meritorious?

Mr. MCNARY. Mr. President, this bill has been before the department for a great many years and the department has reported favorably upon the bill after very exhaustive research. The bill also has the unanimous report from the committee.

Mr. KING. Then I have no objection to the passage of the bill.

The bill was read, considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to E. H. Flagg, St. Helens, Oreg., formerly deputy collector of internal revenue, the sum of $1,000, representing one-half the sum of $2,000 paid by the J. S. Kimball Co., in full satisfaction of the claim of the United States and the said E. H. Flagg against said company, for violation of the internal revenue laws of the United States, to the clerk of the United States District Court for the District of Alaska, second division, at Nome, Alaska, on December 3, 1901.

HENRY FLANERY

The bill (S. 1294) for the relief of Henry Flanery was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that bill go over.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Utah allow me very briefly to call attention to the facts involved in that bill?

Mr. KING. Yes; but I notice that the beneficiary of the bill was court-martialed.

Mr. FLETCHER. That is true. He enlisted on June 12, 1900, at St. Louis, Mo.; he was in the service and saw active duty in the Philippines and in China.

Mr. REED. And he was also wounded.

Mr. FLETCHER. And he was quite seriously wounded in China, and he suffers from that wound to-day. After coming back from the Philippines and China, he was absent without leave; he was court-martialed and given a dishonorable discharge. The fact is that six days after being guilty of the offense of being absent without leave he appeared, surrendered, made no defense at all to the charge. The circumstances were rather peculiar, but he was absent without leave for six days. Then he voluntarily came forward and submitted to his punishment.

Having served for three years in the Philippines and in China, and having been seriously wounded while on active duty in combat in China, and suffering from that wound to-day, I submit that absence without leave, under those circumstances, ought not to preclude him from the benefits of the law.

Mr. KING. I have no objection to the passage of the bill.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs, with amendments, in line 5, before the name "Flanery," to strike out "Henry" and to insert "Harry," and at the end of line 8, after the words "United States," to insert:

Provided, That no bounty, back pay, pension, or allowance shall be held to have accrued prior to the passage of this act.

So as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of any laws conferring rights, privileges, and benefits upon honorably discharged soldiers Harry Flanery, formerly private, Troop C, Sixth Regiment United States Cavalry, shall hereafter be held and considered to have been honorably discharged July 3, 1903, from the military service of the United States: Provided, That no bounty, back pay, pension, or allowance shall be held to have accrued prior to the passage of this act.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill for the relief of Harry Flanery."

JAMES J. JORDAN

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 3027) for the relief of James J. Jordan, which had been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment, on page 1, line 9, after the word "Corps," to insert "on February 19, 1901," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of the pension laws and the laws governing the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, or any branch thereof, James J. Jordan shall hereafter be held and considered to have been honorably discharged from the military service of the United States as a private of the Thirty-third Company United States Coast Artillery Corps on February 19, 1901: Provided, That no pension shall accrue prior to the passage of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I think the committee has slipped on the wording of that bill. There ought to be a further amendment agreed to in the last line on page 1. I move at that point, after the word "pension," to strike out the words "shall accrue" and to insert "or back pay shall be held to have accrued." That is the form in which the proviso ought always to be inserted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Pennsylvania will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 1, line 10, after the word "pension," it is proposed to strike out the words "shall accrue" and to insert "or back pay shall be held to have accrued," so that it will read:

That no pension or back pay shall be held to have accrued prior to the passage of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CHARLES MORTON WILSON

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1529) for the relief of Charles Morton Wilson, which had been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment, on page 1, line 7, after the word "been," to strike out "late of" and to insert "enrolled as a private in," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of the pension laws or any laws conferring rights, privileges, or benefits upon persons honorably discharged from the United States Army, their widows, children, or dependent relatives, Charles Morton Wilson shall be held and considered to have been enrolled as a private in Company C, Eighty-fourth Regiment Indiana Volunteer Infantry, on September 12, 1863, to have been honorably discharged on December 31, 1863, and to have served continuously between such dates; but no pension, pay, nor bounty shall be held to have accrued prior to the passage of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KING. I should like an explanation of that bill. I see that the Secretary of War says that this man was a civilian; that he was never in the military service of the United States.

Mr. REED. That is true. He tried to enlist, but was about a year under age. However, he was accepted by the captain of the company; he was put into uniform and served faithfully for a considerable time—upward of two years, according to my recollection. He did all the work of a soldier; carried food to the outposts on the very front skirmish line in circumstances of great danger; and, although he was an immature boy, he performed faithful service for a long time in uniform. The only reason he was not on the muster roll as a soldier was the fact that he told his age truthfully.

Mr. KING. May I ask the Senator whether the report would indicate that he was a mere personal attendant, a servant, as the expression is, of some officer?

Mr. REED. Yes; that is what the pay roll indicated, Mr. President; but, as a fact, he served in a uniform at the very front under extreme danger, and performed all the duties of a soldier. We passed a bill last year for a similar reason.

Mr. KING. I think the beneficiary is entitled to the passage of the bill.

Mr. REED. It seemed to the committee to be meritorious.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WAR-TIME COMMISSIONED RANK TO RETIRED ENLISTED MEN

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 460) to give war-time commissioned rank to retired enlisted men, which had been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That all warrant officers and enlisted men who served in the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, or Coast Guard of the United States during the World War or the Spanish-American War, and whose service during such war was creditable, and who have been or hereafter may be retired according to law, shall on the date of approval of this act or upon retirement in the case of those now on the active lists of the services named herein, be advanced in rank on the retired list to the highest commissioned, warrant, or enlisted grade held by them during such war: Provided, That nothing in this act shall entitle any of the personnel described herein while on active duty to any other rank than that in which they were serving at the time of retirement: And provided further, That no increase in active or retired pay or allowances shall result from the passage of this act.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, this bill gives a brevet title or rank to some 28 persons who are not now beneficiaries of the general law which we passed giving the right to bear the highest title which was enjoyed during the World War to all officers who served in that war. The fact is that early in the war the War Department gave a number of old sergeants temporary commissions as captains in order to use them in the training of some of the new National Army troops. The experiment was not generally successful, but some of those men served as commissioned officers throughout the war. Some of them had to revert to their enlisted status because they could not make the grade as officers. The purpose of this bill is not to increase their pay or allowances in any way but simply to allow them the brevet title which they earned at that time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, what is the purpose of this bill? I happened to be out of the Chamber a moment ago and did not hear the explanation.

Mr. REED. The purpose of the bill is simply to give a sort of legislative recognition to the fact that certain retired enlisted men did enjoy commissioned rank during the World War. It puts them on the retired list as of the highest rank they held during the war time. It does not give them any additional retired pay or allowances, but merely the familiar brevet title, which is not unusual in the Senator's own State.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. And it involves no financial obligation whatever.

Mr. REED. It involves no financial obligation whatever.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, the explanation is very satisfactory, and I hope the bill will pass.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to give wartime commissioned rank to retired warrant officers and enlisted men."

CLAIMANTS IN BALTIMORE AND HARFORD COUNTIES, MD.

The resolution (S. Res. 167) referring Senate bill 3623, for the relief of certain persons formerly having interests in Baltimore and Harford Counties, Md., to the court of claims for findings of fact, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LOGAN] advise us what the provisions of Senate bill 3623 are? We are apparently proposing to give validity to a bill and sending a bill with which we are not familiar—at least I am not, and which is not before us—to the Court of Claims.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, about all we did was to get rid of the preamble of the bill, which was much longer than the bill itself. The purpose of the bill was to have the United States waive certain limitations and allow certain claimants to file suit in the Court of Claims for consequential damages growing out of the taking over by the Government of a testing ground in Maryland. It has been before the committee I understand a good many times. We have little knowledge of the damages or whether there were any damages, and we could not tell about that. So it was the idea of the committee that we should refer the matter to the Court of Claims, and that court through its instrumentalities should ascertain the extent of the damage, and report its finding back to the committee. That was the purpose of the bill; but I understand that the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS] has an amendment which he desires to offer to the resolution, and as he seems to be absent, I will ask that the resolution go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be passed over.

TRINITY RIVER BRIDGE, TEXAS

The bill (H. R. 8250), granting authority to the Texas State Highway Commission to maintain and operate, as constructed, a free highway bridge across Trinity River between the counties of Navarro and Henderson, in the State of Texas, was read, considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

INCOME OF RELIGIOUS AND BENEVOLENT SOCIETIES IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

The bill (S. 3634) to amend section 600 of the act of March 3, 1901 (31 Stat. 1284; D. C. Code, title 5, sec. 122), was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 600 of the act of March 3, 1901 (31 Stat. 1284; D. C. Code, title 5, sec. 122), be, and the same is hereby, amended by striking out the words "clear annual income from which shall not exceed in value $25,000," and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "income from which shall be applied to the purposes of such society."

BILL PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 95) to amend the second paragraph of section 6 of the civil service retirement act of May 29, 1930 (relating to persons retired for disability), was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that bill go over. I should like to examine it more carefully.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

CORNELIA CLAIBORNE

The bill (S. 1088) for the relief of Cornelia Claiborne, was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Cornelia Claiborne, widow of Hamilton Cabell Claiborne, late American consul at Frankfort, Germany, the sum of $7,000, being one year's salary of her deceased husband.

EDITH TOLERTON LATHROP

The bill (S. 1205) for the relief of Edith Tolerton Lathrop was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Edith Tolerton Lathrop, widow of Lorin A. Lathrop, late Foreign Service officer of the United States, retired, and formerly American consul at Bristol, England; Cardiff, Wales; and Nassau, the Bahama Islands, the sum of $3,500, being one year's salary of her deceased husband.

LUCY COBB STEWART

The bill (S. 2269) for the relief of Lucy Cobb Stewart was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Lucy Cobb Stewart, widow of Nathaniel B. Stewart, late consul general at Barcelona, the sum of $9,000, such sum representing one year's salary of her deceased husband, who died while at his post of duty.

NEAL D. BORUM

The bill (H. R. 6347) for the relief of Neal D. Borum was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Comptroller General be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed, notwithstanding the provisions of the act of May 22, 1928 (45 Stat. 697), to credit the accounts of Neal D. Borum, special disbursing officer at the embassy of the United States at London, in the sum of $810.62, representing the amount paid by him for expenses incurred by a member of the delegation to the naval conference at London and his staff when they returned to the United States on a vessel of foreign registry.

WILLIAM GIRARD JOSEPH BENNETT

The bill (S. 860) for the relief of William Girard Joseph Bennett was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that bill go over, as I should like to examine it.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I will be glad to explain the bill if the Senator will permit me.

Mr. KING. Very well; I withhold the objection.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. The bill seeks to give the individual named the benefit of an honorable discharge. The petitioner served in the Navy during the World War and was honorably discharged. Later he reenlisted, and was dishonorably discharged for the offense, as I recall, of drunkenness.

It is the policy of the Naval Committee and I think likewise the policy of the Committee on Military Affairs where a veteran has served honorably during the period of the World War and it appears that in a later enlistment he has, for a minor offense, been dishonorably discharged, that, for the purpose of receiving the benefit of his war service, he shall have been considered honorably discharged from it. That is a question of policy that has been recognized for years by both the Military Affairs Committee and the Naval Affairs Committee. It is the only exception made. If a veteran has served honorably during the war period and later reenlists and has a mishap and is given a dishonorable discharge, he shall not be precluded from the benefits of his honorable service during the World War.

Mr. KING. Let me say to the Senator that the report of the Secretary of the Navy states that he deserted, then apparently was arrested and broke arrest.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. The report states:

He surrendered himself to naval jurisdiction, was court-martialed, and suffered a dishonorable discharge.

Mr. KING. He broke arrest after having been arrested, and was tried and convicted by general court-martial and sentenced to be confined for one year and to be dishonorably discharged. It would seem that his offense was more than a little scrape.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. We have a very large number of these personal bills coming before the Military Affairs Committee and the Naval Affairs Committee asking to have military records corrected. As a matter of fact, the record is never corrected. If the men are once dishonorably discharged, they are always dishonorably discharged; but in certain cases, if they have served honorably during the war, permission is granted to them to have the benefits that other veterans enjoy by providing that for the receipt of benefits extended to war veterans they may be treated as if honorably discharged.

I will say to the Senator that there are only a very few of these cases; that the committees have rejected innumerable cases of this character because they do not come within their general rule, which is narrow and restricted; namely, that a veteran who went through the war honorably, and later, in months or years afterward reenlists and then deserts or gets drunk and is given a dishonorable discharge, shall not be precluded from the benefits provided for war service faithfully rendered. A veteran honorably discharged who commits crime after the war is not denied compensation or other war benefits. Why should a reenlisted veteran be denied his war record benefits?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered by the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of any laws conferring rights, privileges, and benefits upon persons honorably discharged from the United States Navy William Girard Joseph Bennett shall be held and considered to have been honorably discharged from the United States Navy on the 29th day of April, 1921: Provided, That no bounty, back pay, pension, or allowance shall be held to have accrued prior to the passage of this act.

CONSTRUCTION OF PIPE LINES IN THE DISTRICT

The bill (S. 2496) to permit construction, maintenance, and use of certain pipe lines for petroleum and petroleum products in the District of Columbia was considered by the Senate and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia be, and they are hereby, authorized and empowered to grant permission to the Griffith-Consumers Co., a corporation organized and existing under the laws of the State of Delaware, the owner of square 661 in the city of Washington in the District of Columbia, said square being bounded on the north by R Street, on the south by S Street, on the east by Half Street, and on the west by First Street, its successors and assigns, to lay down, construct, maintain, and use not more than 10 pipe lines for the carriage of petroleum and petroleum products from a point or points within said square 661, in and through R Street, due east to Half Street, east, and thence north on Half Street, east, to a point opposite lots 12 or 13 in square east of square 708 (through which said lots the said Griffith-Consumers Co. now has an easement to run said pipe lines), thence through said lots or any other lots in said square east of square 708 which may hereafter be acquired by the said Griffith-Consumers Co. or through which it may secure an easement, and to the pierhead line of the Anacostia River.

SEC. 2. That all the construction and use provided for herein shall be under such regulations and rentals as the Commissioners of the District of Columbia may make and establish in connection therewith.

SEC. 3. That no permission granted or enjoyed hereunder shall vest any title or interest in or to the land within the above-mentioned streets or affect any right, title, or interest of the United States in or to land within square east of square 708.

SEC. 4. That the Congress reserves the right to amend, alter, or repeal this act at any time.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I should like to ask for an explanation of this bill.

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, the bill authorizes the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to grant permission to the Griffiths-Consumers Co. to lay down not more than 10 pipe lines in southeast Washington, running under the property owned by the company and under adjacent streets and other public lands to a pierhead in the Anacostia River. It has been fully considered, and the District Commissioners have given it their approval.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WASHINGTON SUBURBAN SANITARY COMMISSION

The bill (S. 3222) to amend an act approved March 3, 1917, known as the District of Columbia Appropriation act for the year ending June 30, 1918, was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the provision of the District of Columbia appropriation act for the year ending June 30, 1918, relating to the supply of water for the Washington Suburban Sanitary Commission by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, is hereby repealed and reenacted so as to read as follows:

"For the protection of the health of the residents of the District of Columbia and the employees of the United States Government residing in Maryland near the District of Columbia boundary, the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, upon the request of the Washington Suburban Sanitary Commission, a body corporate, established by chapter 313 of the acts of 1916 of the State of Maryland, or upon the request of its legally appointed successor, are hereby authorized to deliver water from the water-supply system of the District of Columbia to said Washington Suburban Sanitary Commission, or its successor, for distribution to territory in Maryland within the Washington Suburban Sanitary District as designated in the aforesaid act, or any amendment thereto, and to connect District of Columbia water mains with water mains in the State of Maryland at such points at or near the District of Columbia line as may be agreed upon from time to time by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia and the Washington Suburban Sanitary Commission, under the conditions hereinafter named, namely:

"That before such connections shall be made the said Washington Suburban Sanitary Commission, or its legally appointed successor, shall secure authority from the legislature of the State of Maryland to enter into an agreement with the said Commissioners of the District of Columbia outlining the conditions under which the service is to be rendered.

"The agreement between the Commissioners of the District of Columbia and the said Washington Suburban Sanitary Commission or its legally appointed successor shall provide, among other things—

"First. That the meters on each of said connections shall be located within the District of Columbia and shall remain under the jurisdiction of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia.

"Second. The rates at which water will be furnished, said rates to be based on the actual cost to the United States and the District of Columbia of delivering water to the points designated above, including an interest charge at 4 per cent per annum and a suitable allowance for depreciation.

"Third. That payments for water so furnished shall be made through the collector of taxes of the District of Columbia at such times as the Commissioners of the District of Columbia may direct, said payments to be deposited in the Treasury of the United States as other water rents now collected in the District of Columbia are deposited.

"Fourth. That at no time shall the amount of water furnished the said Washington Suburban Sanitary Commission or its successor exceed the amount that can be spared without jeopardizing the interests of the United States or of the District of Columbia.

"Fifth. That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia shall have at all times the right to investigate the distribution system in Maryland, and if, in their opinion, there is a wastage of water they shall have the right to curtail the supply to said sanitary district to the amount of such wastage."

EDGAR JOSEPH CASEY

The bill (S. 863) for the relief of Edgar Joseph Casey was considered by the Senate and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of any laws conferring rights, privileges, and benefits upon persons honorably discharged from the United States Navy Edgar Joseph Casey shall be held and considered to have been honorably discharged from the United States Navy on the 1st day of September, 1925: Provided, That no bounty, back pay, pension, or allowance shall be held to have accrued prior to the passage of this act.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, this bill is similar to the previous one. It is the one exception that the committee makes to the general rule of rejecting all these private bills seeking to set aside the penalties of a dishonorable discharge.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DAVID J. MAHONEY, RETIRED

The bill (S. 879) authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to advance on the retired list of the Navy David J. Mahoney, retired, to chief boilermaker, retired, was considered by the Senate and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized to advance on the retired list of the Navy David J. Mahoney, boilermaker, retired, to the rating of chief boilermaker (permanent appointment), retired, with the pay and allowances of that rating: Provided, That no bounty, back pay, pension, or allowance shall be held to have accrued prior to the passage of this act.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. This bill is recommended favorably by the department. The report from the Navy Department, if read, will indicate the justice of this legislation.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RETIREMENT OF ACTING ASSISTANT SURGEONS OF THE NAVY

The bill (S. 894) directing the retirement of acting assistant surgeons of the United States Navy at the age of 64 years was considered by the Senate and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That acting assistant surgeons of the United States Navy who, on the date of the passage of this act, have reached the age of 64 years shall be placed on the retired list of the Navy with pay at the rate of three-fourths of their active-duty pay.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, does the Senator from Massachusetts think that that is wise legislation?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, this is a bill about which there can be very wide difference of opinion. There is this to be said about it, though, and I think if I review the facts the Senator will agree with the action taken by the committee:

There are two acting assistant surgeons in the United States Navy who are physically disabled. They have reached the age of 64 years. One of two things can be done: The Navy Department can keep them on the pay roll and allow them to draw their salaries, though physically disabled and really unable to do their work as acting assistant surgeons. The other course is——

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an interruption?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Yes.

Mr. KING. This is not a general law, then? It merely takes care of two specific cases?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. That is all.

Mr. KING. I have no objection.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. And may I say to the Senator that it is with the understanding that when they are retired no other acting assistant surgeons will be employed to take their places. It is really a humanitarian bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LAWRENCE L. MYATT AND MILLER S. BURGIN

The bill (S. 3051) to reinstate Lawrence L. Myatt and Miller S. Burgin as midshipmen in the United States Naval Academy was announced as next in order.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, this bill is to reinstate two young men who were deservedly dropped from the Naval Academy for smuggling two girls into the cadet mess.

We would not report out such a bill as this from the Military Affairs Committee. It seems to me that to cancel disciplinary action by special act of Congress is destructive of all discipline. I would rather not let the bill pass without a full explanation from the chairman of the committee, or from the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, these two young men were duly appointed to the Naval Academy, and in their second year of schooling they committed a serious breach of discipline. On one Sunday evening they brought into the mess hall two young ladies, in the nature of a stunt, having first put upon them the blouses of midshipmen. After they arrived at one of the tables in the mess hall, suspecting that one of the superior officers detected them, they withdrew. A few days later an investigation was made and the authorities of the academy dismissed these young men from the institution.

One of the young men is from my own State. The other, incidentally, happens to be the son of a minister who is now living in Georgia, but who at the time lived in the State of Florida and formerly in Texas.

The record of the young men was creditable except for this incident. The committee went rather thoroughly into the matter of dismissal of midshipmen because of breaches of discipline; and we found that in this case the punishment could not have been more severe if the young men had been accompanied by these young ladies to their rooms, and had entertained them in their own private quarters. Such an act has long been recognized as adequate cause for the dismissal of midshipmen.

There is another offense in which young men at the academy indulge which is known as "taking French leave," which means that after 10 o'clock at night, when everybody is supposed to be in bed, the young men dress, get out of their rooms, jump the wall, go into town, remain out for several hours, come back and return to their rooms. If they are detected—and there have been several cases of the kind—the punishment is to be sent to the "jug" for one month.

The Senators who reviewed this case felt that punishment by dismissal for a "stunt" by two young men of taking into the mess hall, on the impulse of the moment, two young girls whose reputation was beyond question—there is not the slightest question about their being young ladies of good family and of good moral character—was too severe, in view of the policy of the academy of only giving a month in the brig to midshipmen who deliberately plan and work out how they can sneak out, get over the wall, go into the town of Annapolis, go to dances, enjoy themselves, and get back. We felt that that is an offense that is certainly as serious as this.

Because of the good record of these young men, the good character of the young ladies, the fact that it was largely a school stunt, and the fact that it had been done before but nobody had been caught, the committee felt that these boys could not be charged with anything approaching moral turpitude, or anything that was of such a serious nature as to brand them, whenever they seek to take a civil-service examination or whenever they seek to obtain a position in afterlife, as having committed an offense so serious that they were dismissed from the Naval Academy.

One of these boys does not intend to return to the Naval Academy. I doubt if either of them will do so. Both of them immediately entered school elsewhere, one in the school of technology in Georgia, Georgia Tech, and the other entered Massachusetts Tech. They have made excellent school records, but they and their families are sensitive about this matter. They do not want to carry through life the charge of having been dismissed from the academy because on one Sunday afternoon, when two girls stumped them by asking, "Take us into the mess hall," on the spur of the moment, they brought these young ladies who had visited them at the academy Sunday afternoon into the mess hall. We have provided in this bill that the young men may resign if the bill is enacted into law giving them permission to reenter the academy. Let me add that the mental anguish these young men have suffered has been in itself a severe punishment.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, do I understand that the bill does not restore them to the academy?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. It does restore them to the academy, but they have permission to resign if they see fit.

Mr. CONNALLY. Suppose they do not resign.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Then they can go to the academy; but I have reason to believe that one of these young men in all probability will not reenter the academy. He desires his record of dismissal removed. We of the Naval Affairs Committee do not think the breach of discipline sufficient to justify branding these young men for life with a record of dismissal from the Naval Academy.

Mr. CONNALLY. To whom will they be charged? One of these young men is from my State.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Yes.

Mr. CONNALLY. How does it affect the record as to the quota?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. It has no effect upon that.

Mr. CONNALLY. Is the Senator sure of that? The department indicates to me that if they should be restored they would be deducted from the quota.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. From the personal appointment quota of the Senator who appointed them?

Mr. CONNALLY. Yes.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I think perhaps that is true. I ask the Senator, however, in view of what I have said, whether he does not think that this is a case for clemency? It is not so serious, at least, as many cases we could conceive of. I refer to one that has been acted upon by the academy with which we are in full accord; namely, that the moment young ladies are taken beyond the mess hall into private quarters, that means dismissal. We agree that that is a sound policy; but if these boys had done even that they could not have received a more severe punishment.

The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. KEAN] has given a good deal of time to this case. Both he and I were on the committee of visitors to the academy. We talked the matter over with the authorities there; and while they feel that we ought to uphold them in the decision they have made, I think they would not consider favorable action by the Congress on this bill as tending to lessen their authority or to indicate we favor laxity in discipline.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is being considered under the 5-minute rule. The time of the Senator from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I ask unanimous consent to continue the consideration of the bill before the Senate for five minutes more.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, that may be done.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. One of the reasons for this severe action was that the authorities of the academy wanted to stop a practice that had been going on up there—not a common practice, but something that had happened before—and that very thing, unfortunately, was in part the inducement for these boys to do what they did. They knew it had been done before. Therefore there was a failure to appreciate its seriousness. The committee thought it was pretty hard to have the first two that were detected given this severe penalty.

Mr. KEAN. Mr. President——

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I yield to the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. KEAN. We went into this matter very carefully with the officers. These boys were nice boys. They stood well. What happened was that these boys drove in an automobile with these girls down to the academy and one of the girls said to them, "I dare you to take me into the mess hall." They had heard that other girls had gone in. The boys said, "All right"; and one of their companions threw a couple of blouses out of the window of the academy and these girls put the blouses over the upper parts of their dresses. They did not change their clothes or anything of the kind, and they walked into the mess hall. That is the extent of the offense.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, that is all very sweet and pretty about their being nice boys and nice girls, but the lives of a great many people are going to depend on the good discipline of these young men if they are reinstated in the Navy, and discipline means obeying orders. I think it is perfectly destructive of discipline for Congress to say that the action of the President of the United States in dismissing these young men from the naval service is to be overridden. I ask the Senate to listen to this part of the report of the Secretary of the Navy, who is opposed to the enactment of this bill. He says:

> Midshipmen Myatt and Burgin, who were equally responsible, knew the seriousness of the offense committed. They did it deliberately and apparently with the intention of flouting the authorities. Even before the matter had been brought to the attention of the Superintendent of the Naval Academy he received several telegrams from Congressmen, Senators, and others, urging clemency. In addition, efforts were made by these young men to have the naval authorities influenced through the daily newspapers. Their conduct throughout the whole affair was such as to make it most apparent that they are not desirable material for midshipmen.

Do we want Navy officers or Army officers who undertake to override the action of their superiors by appeals to Representatives and Senators and newspapers? I say we do not want them in the Army, and I do not think we want them in the Navy.

Mr. BRATTON. Let the bill go over.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, if I may say just one word before the bill goes over. It is only fair to say that there was great agitation in the school about the dismissal of these boys, that their classmates felt very sorry for them and were very strongly opposed to the action of the authorities. I think the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. KEAN] will agree with me that we thought that there was some slight personal feeling on the part of some officers and that part of the personal feeling was due to a feeling of criticism because some similar stunts had been carried on not detected, and talked generally among the boys. We felt the officers in charge lost the sense of impartiality that should have been exercised. The young men were willing to be demoted for a year or given any other severe punishment other than dismissal.

It is true there was a great deal of protest on the part of the classmates of these young men and in the community at Annapolis because of the severity of the punishment. This did not help the case, unfortunately. But the boys were not responsible for the protests of their friends and classmates. Naturally, they appealed to the Senators and Representatives who appointed them for clemency.

I will say that, so far as we were able to observe, the conduct of the young men was all one could expect under the circumstances, and if there was personal feeling it was on both sides.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Regular order!

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, if I may say just a word, I met both these young men. They are perfect gentlemen, high-class young men in every respect, splendid material for the Navy.

My objection to this procedure is that the punishment was too severe. I will grant that they might have been given some punishment—put on board ship for 10 days, or something like that—but to dismiss them entirely and ruin their careers is simply too harsh. I think they ought to be restored. I quite agree with what the Senator from Massachusetts has said.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under objection, the bill will be passed over.

RIO GRANDE PROJECT

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 55) to amend section 2 of the act of February 25, 1927 (44 Stat. L., pt. 2, p. 336), was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That any money appropriated pursuant to the authorization contained in the act approved February 25, 1927 (44 Stat. L., pt. 3, p. 1792), shall not be charged to the construction cost or included as a part of the operation and maintenance charges of the Rio Grande project, nor shall such money be in anywise reimbursable by the water users of said project.

BILLS PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 3654) to authorize turning over to the Indian Service vehicles, vessels, and supplies seized and forfeited for violation of liquor laws was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (H. R. 7912) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill goes over.

GUILFORD COURTHOUSE NATIONAL MILITARY PARK

The bill (S. 1855) to provide for the care and maintenance of the Guilford Courthouse National Military Park was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That hereafter the vacancies existing in the commission in charge of the Guilford Courthouse National Military Park created by the act entitled "An act to establish a national military park at the battlefield of Guilford Courthouse," approved March 2, 1917, shall not be filled, and the duties of the offices thus vacated shall devolve upon the remaining commissioner or commissioners for said park: Provided, That when all the offices of commissioner of Guilford Courthouse National Military Park are vacated the duties of such commissioners shall thereafter be performed under the direction of the Secretary of War.

BENTON FIELD MILITARY RESERVATION

The bill (S. 3443) to authorize the Secretary of War to grant a right of way to the Alameda Belt Line across the Benton Field Military Reservation, Alameda, Calif., was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and empowered to grant to the Alameda Belt Line, a corporation organized and existing under the laws of the State of California, its successors and assigns, a permanent right of way, in such location and under such terms and conditions as may be approved by the Secretary of War, over and across the Benton Field Military Reservation, Alameda, Calif., for railroad purposes, with full power to locate, construct, and operate railroad tracks, together with necessary spurs and sidings and other railroad appurtenances, appendages, and adjuncts: Provided, That the land shall not be used for other than railroad purposes, and when the property shall cease to be so used it shall revert to the United States.

WAR DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATIONS

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 3514) regulating the use of appropriations for the military and nonmilitary activities of the War Department, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the expenditure of appropriations for the military and nonmilitary activities of the War Department, the Secretary of War shall, unless in his discretion the interest of the Government will not permit, purchase, or contract for, within the limits of the United States, only articles of the growth, production, or manufacture of the United States, notwithstanding that such articles of the growth, production, or manufacture of the United States may cost more, if such excess of cost be not unreasonable.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I would like to have an explanation of the bill.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, this bill would enact into general law a proviso which is now carried in each of the appropriation bills. At the present time the Army and the Navy and all the departments are bound to do exactly what is provided in this measure. It is working very satisfactorily, and the whole purpose of enacting the bill is to provide just what is carried in the different appropriation bills.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, would it prevent the purchase of necessary supplies and equipment for the Army and Navy in other countries where we might have troops?

Mr. REED. No; it applies only to continental United States.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CLAIMS OF PERSONS IN BALTIMORE AND HARFORD COUNTIES, MD.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that we return to Senate Resolution 167, referring Senate bill 3623, for the relief of certain persons formerly having interests in Baltimore and Harford Counties, Md., to the Court of Claims for findings of fact.

I may say that the object of this resolution is simply to refer a matter from the Committee on Claims to the Court of Claims. I do not think there is any objection to it. The bill which is the subject of the resolution passed the Senate twice in more concise form. The Committee on Claims, however, now wants the facts before they report another bill. I would simply like to have the matter sent to the Court of Claims for adjudication.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the Senator knows that under the law—and there has been a great deal of criticism—the Court of Claims not only finds facts but pronounces judgment. I would like to know, before I would be willing to refer this to the Court of Claims, whether it may pronounce judgment in the case?

Mr. TYDINGS. The resolution provides "and report to the Senate in accordance therewith."

Mr. KING. That is, in accordance with the present law, and it would permit them to pronounce judgment. I have introduced a bill, which is pending, to deny to that court the right to pronounce judgment, but that they shall make their findings and refer them to the Congress. There has been some legitimate criticism of the decisions of the Court of Claims, and before I would be willing to submit this matter to the Court of Claims I would want to be advised that there was some merit in the claim which is to be submitted.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I may say to the Senator that the War Department advises that this claim should be paid. The Committee on Claims twice reported favorably a bill for the payment of the claim, and the bill passed the Senate and received a favorable report from the House committee, but it died in the last few days of the session. I have withdrawn the bill providing that these men shall be paid, and have simply asked that the Court of Claims advise the Committee on Claims what they think are the circumstances.

Mr. KING. If the Senator is sure that the matter is to be referred to the Court of Claims with limitations that it may not pronounce judgment but merely make findings of fact and refer them to Congress, I would have no objection; but if it authorizes the court to enter judgment, I shall be opposed to it.

Mr. TYDINGS. It provides that "they shall proceed * * * in accordance with the provisions of the act and report to the Senate in accordance therewith." This is not a joint resolution of both Houses, but the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HOWELL] wants the facts before he will report a bill favorably. This is his resolution. I withdraw my bill and substitute this resolution at his request in order that the facts may be brought to the Senate before action is taken.

Mr. SMOOT. Is the Senator quite sure of what he has stated? On line 8, after the year "1911," appears this language:

And the said court shall proceed with the same in accordance with the provisions of such act.

Mr. TYDINGS. Yes; and will the Senator read on?

Mr. SMOOT. "And report to the Senate in accordance therewith." If they proceed in accordance with the provisions of the act, that is virtually a judgment, is it not, and all you have to do is to report it to the Senate?

Mr. TYDINGS. Suppose it were a judgment. If that were the case, the Senate would then have to appropriate the money.

Mr. SMOOT. Not necessarily.

Mr. TYDINGS. Why not?

Mr. SMOOT. Because of the fact that the House would have something to say about it before the appropriation was made.

Mr. TYDINGS. Of course, that is what I mean.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senate may want to know about the details of it, and it may disagree to the report.

Mr. TYDINGS. A similar bill has already passed the Senate twice.

Mr. SMOOT. That may be.

Mr. TYDINGS. I do not mean the resolution; I mean a bill to pay the money. I have withdrawn the bill providing for the payment of the money, and simply ask that in lieu of that we have the facts before the Senate, notwithstanding the fact that twice the Senate has passed a bill to pay the money.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. This calls simply for information?

Mr. TYDINGS. That is all.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. An investigation of the facts?

Mr. TYDINGS. That is all.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the consideration of the resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. The Senator from Maryland moves to add, in line 10, after the word "act," the words "and the representations of the Government made in connection therewith," so as to make the resolution read:

Resolved, That the bill (S. 3623) entitled "A bill for the relief of certain persons formerly having interests in Baltimore and Harford Counties, Md.," now pending in the Senate, together with all the accompanying papers, be, and the same is hereby, referred to the Court of Claims, in pursuance to the provisions of an act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," approved March 3, 1911; and the said court shall proceed with the same in accordance with the provisions of such act and representations of the Government made in connection therewith and report to the Senate in accordance therewith.

The amendment was agreed to, and the resolution, as amended, was agreed to.

ACQUISITION OF REAL ESTATE BY THE SECRETARY OF WAR

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 3547) to authorize the Secretary of War to acquire, exchange, transfer, and sell certain tracts of real estate, and for other purposes.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I would like to say a word in explanation. This bill is not of very great importance, but it will be helpful.

The bill authorizes an exchange of land, acre for acre, with the State of New York, up at West Point. The Government has 300 acres, the State of New York has 300 acres, and they are willing to give theirs in exchange for ours. The Government gains by the exchange. There is an iron mine on the land which we do not want to buy because we do not want to incur that expense. We want to be able to take the land subject to that.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, this is not a bill for the sale of a lot of forts contemplated to be abandoned?

Mr. REED. No; it has nothing to do with that.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with amendments, on page 4, lines 15 and 16, strike out "National Capital Park and Planning Commission" and insert in lieu thereof "Director of Public Buildings and Public Parks of the National Capital"; page 4, line 18, strike out the words "said commission" at the beginning of the line and insert in lieu thereof "the National Capital Park and Planning Commission"; page 4, line 21, strike out the words "chairman of" and insert the word "commission," and in lieu of the word "commission" insert "Director of Public Buildings and Public Parks"; page 4, line 25, strike out the entire line and insert in lieu thereof "Director of Public Buildings and Public Parks," so as to read:

Be it enacted, etc., That this act shall be known and may be cited as "Fiscal year 1933 Army real estate act."

ACQUISITION

SEC. 2. That the act to authorize the acquisition for military purpose of land in Orange County, N. Y., for use as an addition to the West Point Military Reservation, approved March 3, 1931, be, and the same is hereby, amended by adding to section 1 of said act the following provisos: "Provided further, That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized, upon such terms and conditions as he may deem expedient, to convey to the State of New York the title of the United States to approximately 302 acres of land now comprising a part of said West Point Military Reservation; and to accept in exchange therefor, and for use as an addition to said reservation, the conveyance from said State of approximately 335 acres of land owned by said State: And provided further, That title to land acquired under the provisions of this act may be accepted subject to any easements, rights, or reservations which, in the opinion of the Secretary of War, will not interfere with the use of said land for military purposes."

EXCHANGE

SEC. 3. That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to convey by quitclaim deeds the tracts of real estate now owned by the United States hereafter in this section described, and in exchange therefor to acquire the title to the tracts hereafter in this section described, or rights pertaining thereto or interests therein, for the purposes named:

(c) A strip of land comprising part of the quartermaster depot military reservation at Jeffersonville, Ind., lying along the right of way of the Louisville & Jeffersonville Bridge & Railroad Co., for land now owned by said railroad company lying adjacent to the main section of said depot and partly surrounded by portions of the military reservation.

SALE

SEC. 4. That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized, after due advertisement, to sell or cause to be sold, upon such terms and conditions as he deems advisable, but at not less than the appraised value, the remaining portion of Camp Taylor, Ky., approximately 30 acres, which was not sold under Public, No. 692, Seventy-first Congress, approved February 20, 1931; and he is further authorized, if he deems it advisable, to have said land appraised again, the cost of each appraisal and all other expenses incident to the sale to be paid from the proceeds of the sale; and the net proceeds of such sale shall be deposited in the Treasury to the credit of the military post construction fund.

TRANSFER

SEC. 5. That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to convey by quitclaim deed to the State of Maine that tract of land ceded to the United States by an act of the General Court of Massachusetts, approved March 12, 1808, and described therein as "Battery Pasture, on which a fortification formerly stood, bounded on the north by a road, on the west by Frollett, on the south by the river, and on the east by Frollett, containing 1 acre and 139 rods, as will appear by a report made to Hon. David Sewall, Esq., agent for the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, by Benjamin Parker, surveyor, about the year 1798," to complete the transfer of the Fort McClary military reservation to said State.

EASEMENTS

SEC. 6. That the provisions of the act of Congress approved May 17, 1926, entitled "An act to authorize the Secretary of War to grant easements in and upon public military reservations and other lands under his control" (44 Stat. 562; U. S. C., Supp. II, 1351), are hereby extended and made applicable to oil and gasoline pipe lines.

CLEARING TITLE

SEC. 7. That the Attorney General is hereby authorized to settle, adjust, and compromise any and all outstanding claims adverse to the claim of the United States to title to lands known as Chapman Field, Fla., including all accretions, relictions, shoals, islands, tidelands, and underwater lands lying seaward of the fast lands included in the United States public-land survey of 1847, and to take such steps as he may deem necessary to remove clouds from the Government's title thereto, and there is hereby authorized to be appropriated the sum of $5,000 for such purpose.

NONMILITARY

SEC. 8. (a) That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized, subject to such conditions as may seem to him proper, to convey by quitclaim deed to the State, county, municipality, or proper agency thereof, the Government owned or controlled approach roads to Kill Devil Hill Memorial Reservation, and upon the execution and delivery of such quitclaim deed the jurisdiction of the United States which was ceded by the State over the roads conveyed shall cease and determine.

(b) That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to transfer to the permanent jurisdiction of the Secretary of War for the use of the Alaska Road Commission a plot of land, together with improvements thereon, included in the United States customs reservation in the city of Nome, Alaska, and particularly described as follows:

Beginning at a point 91.8 feet south 43° 46' west from corner south No. 2 of said reservation; thence north 70° west a distance of 63 feet; thence south 20° west a distance of 42.5 feet; thence south 70° east a distance of 58.1 feet; thence north 26° 32' east a distance of 42.8 feet to the point of beginning, such boundaries embracing an area of 2,573 square feet.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EDUCATION OF INDIANS

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 3110) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to arrange with States for the education, medical attention, and relief of distress of Indians, and for other purposes, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized, in his discretion, to enter into a contract or contracts with any State having legal authority so to do for the education, medical attention, and relief of distress of Indians in such State through the qualified agencies of such State, and to expend under such contract or contracts moneys appropriated by Congress for the education, medical attention, and relief of distress of Indians in such State.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Interior in making any contract herein authorized with any State may permit such State to utilize, for the purposes of this act, existing school buildings, hospitals, and all equipment therein or appertaining thereto, including livestock and other personal property owned by the Government, under such terms and conditions as may be agreed upon for their use and maintenance.

SEC. 3. That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to perform any and all acts and to make such rules and regulations as may be necessary and proper for the purpose of carrying the provisions of this act into effect.

SEC. 4. That the Secretary of the Interior shall report to Congress on or before the first Monday in December of each year any contract or contracts made under the provisions of this act, and the moneys expended thereunder.

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, I move to amend the bill in line 5, after the word "State," by inserting the words "except New Mexico." Permit me to say in this connection that I think this is an identical bill with one sponsored by the Senator from California during the last session. He accepted an amendment to exclude the States of Arizona and New Mexico.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, will not the Senator amend his amendment so as to include Arizona?

Mr. BRATTON. I modify my amendment so as to read "except Arizona and New Mexico."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KING. I would like to inquire whether this bill has the approval of the Committee on Indian Affairs. It is a very important measure.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, this is a bill similar to the one that was passed at the last session of Congress, as I recall it, with an amendment proposed by the Senator from New Mexico. I have no objection to the amendment.

The bill simply provides that when the State legislature makes provision to cooperate with the Indian Bureau in matters of health or education of the Indians in the State, they shall have authority for the cooperation. I believe it is a good measure.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JAMES L. PATE

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 207) to correct the military record of James L. Pate, which had been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment, on page 1, line 8, to strike out the words "pension shall accrue" and to insert the words "pension, back pay, or bounty shall be held to have accrued," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of the pension laws James L. Pate shall hereafter be held and considered to have been honorably discharged from the military service of the United States as a private in Company A, Twelfth Regiment Kentucky Volunteer Cavalry, on the 20th day of September, 1862: Provided, That no pension, back pay, or bounty shall be held to have accrued prior to the passage of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

McMullen, late rural mail carrier of the Seymour (Ill.) post office.

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 2426) to authorize the Secretary of War to permit the use of a portion of a National Guard target range near Phoenix, Ariz., as a burial plot, which has been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and to insert:

That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to convey to the State of Arizona not to exceed 1 acre of land within the public lands reserved for military purposes for the use of the National Guard of Arizona by the act of April 7, 1930 (Public, No. 92, 71st Cong.), for use as a burial plot in such manner as the Legislature of the State of Arizona may determine: Provided, That the location of the plot shall be such as in the judgment of the Secretary of War will not interfere with the use of such public lands for the purposes for which they were reserved.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PROPOSED ANTI-INJUNCTION LEGISLATION

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. The bill (S. 935) to amend the Judicial Code and to define and limit the jurisdiction of courts sitting in equity, and for other purposes.

DIVERSION OF WATER FROM NIAGARA RIVER

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, I am going to take the liberty of interrupting the discussion of the pending unfinished business long enough to make a statement upon a matter in which the people of my State are vitally interested, as is also the Senate, I believe.

Mr. President, on the 28th day of January, 1932, the Senate agreed to a resolution I submitted calling upon the Federal Power Commission to advise the Senate of its action, together with its reasons for such action, on the application of the city of Lockport for a preliminary permit covering 275 cubic feet of water per second on the Niagara River. The commission has responded by transmitting to the Senate its opinion in this matter, which has been printed as Senate Document 10. I have read the opinion; I have examined the statutes which govern this situation, and I am satisfied, Mr. President, that the Senate ought not to let this matter rest where it is. We should at least become aware of the policy which is embraced in the opinion of the commission. If we choose to approve the policy of the commission, let us do so deliberately. Should we disapprove it, we ought to take action before the present decision congeals into precedent and precipitates into vested rights.

A brief recital of history is necessary in order to understand the subject of the controversy which the commission has decided.

Out of all the vast flood which pours down the gorge of the Niagara River the United States is permitted a daily diversion at a rate not exceeding 20,000 cubic feet of water per second. That limitation is contained in the treaty of May 13, 1910, between the United States and Great Britain. Nineteen thousand seven hundred and twenty-five cubic feet per second out of this maximum allotment of 20,000 cubic feet per second is held by the Niagara Falls Power Co. under license No. 16 issued by the Federal Power Commission on March 2, 1921, and amended on October 3, 1925. The remaining 275 cubic feet per second were, until recently, covered by license No. 15, held by a group of licensees including the Hydraulic Race Co.

The sequence of the following few events is important and they will therefore be stated chronologically.

On February 24, 1928, the Niagara Falls Power Co. filed an application for an amendment of its license No. 16 so as to be permitted to divert the 275 cubic feet per second embraced within license No. 15 and accompanied its application with instruments executed by most of the licensees of license No. 15, asking leave to surrender the license and to have it transferred to the Niagara Falls Power Co.

On March 13, 1928, notice of the application of the Niagara Falls Power Co. was advertised.

Almost two months thereafter, namely, on May 3, 1928, the last instrument of surrender by the licensees of the license No. 15 was filed. On May 28, 1928, the surrender by the licensees of license No. 15 was accepted by the commission.

On August 14, 1928, the Niagara Falls Power Co. filed a statement of alleged costs in acquiring license No. 15, pursuant to order No. 27 of the commission. The Niagara Falls Power Co. and the commission did not, however, agree upon the amounts allowable as items of cost to be included in the capital account of the power company.

On September 24, 1928, the Federal Power Commission authorized the issuance to the Niagara Falls Power Co. of a 90-day license, embracing the waters formerly covered by license No. 15. This short-term license was from time to time extended, and on August 26, 1931, that license was extended to August 31, 1932.

On January 9, 1932, the city of Lockport, N. Y., filed an application for a preliminary permit to cover the same 275 cubic feet per second.

On January 19, 1932, the Federal Power Commission held that it could not entertain the application of the city of Lockport.

Two questions emerge.

First. Was the commission required to entertain the application of the city of Lockport?

Second. Was the city of Lockport entitled to a preference?

The commission has answered both questions in the negative.

Concerning the first question the commission said:

> Under the Federal water power act * * * the Niagara Falls Power Co. has initiated and established a priority as to this 275 cubic feet per second of water.

Concerning the second question the commission said:

> This section of the statute, section 7 of the Federal water power act, can not be successfully invoked in behalf of the city of Lockport under the application it has filed, since the water covered by Lockport's application is already actually under temporary license by the commission * * *.

Let me emphasize the precise limits of the issue which was raised by the application of the city of Lockport. The question was not whether Lockport was entitled to a license. That would depend upon numerous factors, including the approval of its method of utilizing the water. The question was not whether the application of the Niagara Falls Power Co. should then and there be rejected. There was but a narrow question before the commission, namely, Was the city of Lockport entitled to be heard? Had the commission decided that question in the affirmative it would then have faced the next question: Is the city of Lockport, under section 7 of the act, entitled to a preference?

It is important that a clear understanding be had of the procedure contemplated under the Federal water power act. Those desiring to exploit a water-power project were, under the terms of the act, directed to apply to the Federal Power Commission. The Federal Power Commission is authorized under certain circumstances to issue a preliminary permit to the applicant and in certain other circumstances a license. The function of each of these instruments is distinctly stated in the act. The function of the preliminary permit is prescribed in section 4-E of the act. It is intended "For the purpose of enabling applicants for license hereunder to secure the data and to perform the acts required by section 9 hereof." And in section 5 it is stated that each preliminary permit issued under this act shall be for the sole purpose of maintaining priority of application for a license.

The function of the license is described in section 4-D of the act. That is intended "For the purpose of constructing, operating, and maintaining dams, water conduits, reservoirs, power houses, transmission lines, or other project works necessary or convenient for the development and improvement of navigation and for the development, transmission, and utilization of power" in certain cases.

The duration of the rights conferred by each of these instruments is likewise definitely fixed in the act. A preliminary permit confers a priority for a "period or periods, not exceeding a total of three years, * * *." Section 5.

A license may under the terms of section 6 endure for a period not exceeding 50 years.

What was the status of the 275 cubic feet per second for which Lockport applied?

The opinion of the commission refers to the instrument covering the 275 cubic feet per second held by the Niagara Falls Power Co. as a temporary license. Under the act there is no such legal creature as a temporary license. It is either a preliminary permit, a license, or nothing. Licenses, of course, may be either short-term or long-term licenses. That is left to the discretion of the commission and is in certain respects governed by statute.

Let us first assume the less likely interpretation that the instrument held by the Niagara Falls Power Co. for the 275 cubic feet per second in controversy is a preliminary permit. If so, then its maximum duration is three years and all benefit conferred by it expired on September 24, 1931, which was three years after the date the permit was authorized, or at the latest on October 1, 1931, which was three years after the date when the permit was executed.

Briefly, if the instrument is a preliminary permit, its benefits have expired, and the Niagara Falls Power Co. has no priority and no status which is superior to that of the city of Lockport, and the commission should not only have entertained the application of the city of Lockport but have recognized its preferred status under section 7 of the Federal water power act.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. WAGNER. I yield.

Mr. WHEELER. Did the commission grant the applicant a hearing in this matter?

Mr. WAGNER. No. The city of Lockport was informed that its application could not be entertained.

Mr. WHEELER. They were granted no hearing of any kind with reference to it?

Mr. WAGNER. No; there was no hearing upon the merits at all, because the commission took the legal view, erroneous in my opinion, as I am trying to develop here, that the city of Lockport was in no position to apply, since the outstanding preliminary license attached a priority to it; that is, it gave the Niagara Falls Power Co. a priority. As a matter of fact, priorities are attached, if I may repeat, to preliminary permits issued under the Federal power act, but those permits last only for a period of three years. If this should be called a preliminary permit, then its time has expired, because it was issued more than three years ago.

We turn now to the other and more likely interpretation that the instrument executed by the commission in favor of the Niagara Falls Power Co. was not a preliminary permit but a license. So the commission regarded it. That is made evident by the fact that it called the instrument a temporary license, that it permitted the holder of the instrument to divert water and to operate a power project and that in its opinion (on page 2 of the Senate Document 10) it said, "At the time of the filing of the application by the city of Lockport the identical 275 cubic feet per second of water covered by the Lockport application was under license to Niagara Falls Power Co., effective until August 31, 1932." Let us, therefore, accept the commission's view concerning the status of the 275 cubic feet per second in question: That the water was under license, that the license would expire August 31, 1932. That being the fact what is the position of a municipal applicant? Is it entitled to be heard? Is it entitled to a preference?

The governing section is section 7 of the Federal Water Power act. That section confers a preference upon municipalities—

> In issuing preliminary permits hereunder or licenses where no preliminary permit has been issued and in issuing licenses to new licensees under section 15 hereof.

The statute, in other words, lists three situations in which a municipality is entitled to a preference. Obviously, as the water is now under a license which is about to expire, the present case fits into the third category, namely, "In issuing licenses to new licensees under section 15," since section 15 governs the issuance of new licenses upon the expiration of the original license.

Upon the expiration of a license the commission is expressly authorized to issue a new license to a newcomer if the United States does not first take the project over.

Section 15 provides—

> That if the United States does not, at the expiration of the original license, exercise its right to take over * * * any project * * * the commission is authorized to issue a new license to the original licensee * * * or to issue a new license * * * to a new licensee.

There is nothing in the act which directs the commission to regard the original licensee as enjoying any priority or preferred status. The commission has perfect freedom to license a stranger to the original undertaking. Such being the fact it is plain that the commission is at complete liberty to entertain new applications during the pendency of a license and the fact mentioned by the commission, namely, that the water is "actually under temporary license" is no bar at all to its action.

In fact that seems to have been the earlier attitude of the commission in connection with the first application of the Niagara Falls Power Co. for the 275 cubic feet per second in issue. It entertained the application of the Niagara Falls Power Co., it advertised its application, and notified interested public officials of its consideration thereof long before license No. 15, which embraced the same water, was extinguished by surrender and acceptance, and in fact long before all the holders of license No. 15 expressed their willingness to surrender. The commission did not at that time assert the position that because the water was then "actually under license" it was barred from entertaining the application of the Niagara Falls Power Co.

Should the policy be approved that no one will be heard while these so-called temporary licenses are in effect, then the effort of the commission to secure agreement from prospective licensees on capital costs will prove to be exceedingly slow, since the applicant has an impregnable position not subject to interference by any possible competitor.

In the present case it seems that the policy of the law to grant preference to municipalities is being thwarted. The original application of the Niagara Falls Power Co. was advertised, but not in the city of Lockport. The circumstances are such that the Niagara Falls Power Co. has a license which will expire on August 31, 1932. The commission has not yet committed itself to issue a license to the Niagara Falls Power Co. extending beyond that date. Pursuant to its own order No. 27 it has refused to consider the application of the company for a license extending beyond the expiration day of the present so-called temporary license. It has asked the Niagara Falls Power Co. to come to terms concerning the legitimate cost of acquiring the project which may properly be entered in its capital account. The decision of that question is of tremendous significance both from the point of view of the consumers of electricity and from the point of view of the United States, which may desire to exercise its recapture powers upon the expiration of a license. The company has not yet agreed with the commission. It may well be that the Niagara Falls Power Co. will not be able to secure a long-term license for the reason that it will never agree. It may well be that the Niagara Falls Power Co. will not be able to secure a long-term license for the reason that it does not appear that it has complied with section 639 of the conservation law of the State of New York, which would first require the Niagara Falls Power Co. to secure a State license. Section 9 of the Federal water power act makes compliance with the State laws a condition precedent to the issuance of a license by the Federal Power Commission.

I do not propose that the Senate should displace the commission in deciding the applications of the Niagara Falls Power Co. and the city of Lockport upon their merits. I do contend that the city of Lockport is entitled to be heard and is entitled to have its application entertained. If the commission entertains such an application, it may well be that the city of Lockport will present plans for the utilization of power which are superior to the project presented by the Niagara Falls Power Co. When it entertains the application of the city of Lockport the commission may decide that it is desirable to have a small independent power producer on the Niagara River as a yardstick in measuring the performance of the holder of the bulk of the water rights on that river. Other considerations may become pertinent. I do not propose that we should pass upon them here. Of the 20,000 cubic foot-seconds available to the United States in the Niagara River all but 275 is under long-term license to the Niagara Falls Power Co. If it is entitled to that little remainder, then certainly it should have it. I am not here opposing its claims or advocating the claims of any other applicant. All I do insist is that in view of the policy we laid down in law with respect to municipalities and under the circumstances presented to-day the city of Lockport is entitled to have its application considered.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, on yesterday the able Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], the chairman of the committee reporting the bill now pending, covered several features of the pending bill. I therefore shall endeavor to avoid repetition in so far as it is possible, and where it may not be possible, to approach the various questions from a somewhat different angle.

HOW LABOR FEELS ABOUT INJUNCTIONS

The American Federation of Labor has declared relief from the misuse of injunctions in labor disputes to be its foremost legislative demand. Upon this point labor is absolutely united. There are no conservatives or radicals in the labor movement when it comes to the injunction question. Even the conservatives in the labor movement regard injunctions, as the late Samuel Gompers once characterized them, as "the outrageous, impudent, revolutionary invention of lawless plutocracy." This is strong language; but the truth is that organized labor believes that injunctions deny to workingmen fundamental rights guaranteed by the Constitution and threaten to completely destroy labor unions, as expressed in an editorial in the American Federationist for December, 1927, by President William Green:

Trade unionists are face to face with a condition that menaces the very life of our movement.

Labor is willing to meet industrial problems in the industrial field and to work out solutions with employers, but labor holds that it is manifestly unfair to allow the courts to become the allies of the employers in a partisan struggle.

The injunction is used to make the union illegal and to outlaw its activity by judicial decree—to penalize through equity procedure acts and agencies that are legal according to law as enacted by our lawmaking bodies.

CRITICISMS OF INJUNCTIONS IN LABOR DISPUTES OTHER THAN BY LABOR

It is a serious matter that some three or four million trade-unionists, representing the most skilled and intelligent of the laboring men of this country, should entertain such views regarding injunctions and the courts, particularly the Federal courts. What is yet more serious is that the fears expressed by labor are not groundless and that its complaints are not unwarranted. This has been repeatedly recognized by qualified observers and students of this problem who are neither trade-unionists nor partisans of labor. As long ago as April 27, 1908, President Roosevelt, in a special message to Congress, said:

They are blind, indeed, who fail to recognize the bitterness caused among large bodies of worthy citizens by the use that has repeatedly been made of the power of injunctions in labor disputes.

In the same vein, former Senator George W. Pepper, of Pennsylvania, in an address to the American Bar Association in 1924, said:

I was led recently to make such a review of our industrial history by my desire to account for the growing bitterness of organized labor toward the Federal courts. In the Senate one quickly becomes aware of the existence throughout the country of a sentiment on this subject which, if unchecked, may easily develop into a revolutionary sentiment. * * * Injunction orders have become more and more comprehensive and far-reaching in their provisions, until they culminate in the shopmen's injunction. * * * Every thoughtful lawyer who has not already done so should read that order and meditate upon its significance. In doing so he should have in mind that during the shopmen's strike in 1922—

Referring to the Daugherty injunction—nearly every one of the 261 Class I railroads and a number of short-line railroads applied for injunctions in the various Federal courts. No applications were denied. In all nearly 300 were issued.

Statements of this kind, recognizing the seriousness of the situation which has been created by the use, or rather abuse, of injunctions in labor disputes, can be multiplied practically without end.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. BLAINE. I do.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. In connection with the statement just read relating to the number of injunctions issued, it is my recollection that there were 5,500 deputy United States marshals either regularly or specially appointed to serve the writs.

Mr. BLAINE. I understand that to be the fact; and before the debate on this bill is ended I think it will be developed very clearly that the injunction issued in those cases was as harsh as possibly could be conceived by any judge or court or agent of any court.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin further yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. BLAINE. I do.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. It appeared to be an effort to end the strike by the process of injunction; to make it impossible to carry on the strike by reason of the terms incorporated in the injunction itself.

Mr. BLAINE. Exactly; and the Daugherty injunction was issued by a Federal judge who gave it the characteristics and all the earmarks and all of the authority of an injunction that would reach into every United States district court in the United States, clear beyond the jurisdiction of the court issuing that particular injunction. Injunctions were issued in the several United States district courts; but I am speaking now of the Daugherty injunction issued by Judge Wilkerson.

Suffice it to call attention to the fact that the Outlook—February 29, 1928—and the Chicago Tribune—January 26, 1928—have in editorials declared that the abuse of injunction in labor disputes calls for legislative remedy; and neither the Outlook nor the Chicago Tribune can by any stretch of imagination be called radical or prolabor.

THE CLAYTON ACT AND ITS INTERPRETATION

The abuse of injunctions in labor disputes led Congress, in the Clayton Antitrust Act of 1915, to insert a number of sections whose expressed purpose was to check this evil and to curb the abuses that had grown up. The League of Industrial Rights and the National Manufacturers' Association at the time denounced the action of Congress and claimed that it radically altered the law in favor of a class—namely, labor. No sooner had this act been passed, however, than these organizations contended that Congress had not really changed the law; and they succeeded in convincing the courts, including the United States Supreme Court, that this contention was correct. Whether the courts misconstrued the law or whether the wording of the act of Congress was defective is immaterial in this connection. The important fact is that the labor sections of the Clayton Act—aside from the sections relating to jury trial in cases of indirect criminal contempts where the offense charged is also a crime—have become meaningless and have completely failed of their purpose. In fact, there is some question whether the Clayton Act, as interpreted by the courts, has not made the situation worse by allowing private parties to obtain injunctions in labor disputes under the antitrust laws, where previously only the Government could get such injunctions.

INCREASED USE OF INJUNCTIONS AND THE WARNING OF CHIEF JUSTICE TAFT

For a few years following the passage of the Clayton Act there seem to have been comparatively few injunctions in labor cases by the Federal courts. Then came the injunction which was taken out in the name of the United States by Attorney General Palmer in the United States District Court of the District of Indiana, which required the officers of the United Mine Workers of America to call off the nation-wide bituminous coal strike set for November 1, 1919. William Howard Taft, then in private life, in an article in the Philadelphia Public Ledger of November 20, 1919, approved this sweeping injunction, but also issued a warning against the too frequent resort to injunctions in labor disputes. The former President and late Chief Justice said on this occasion:

The usefulness of the injunction in the coal strike should not mislead reactionary employers into the belief that it is a panacea for labor troubles. It has worked well in this case because public opinion has sanctioned its use by the courts at the instance of the Government in defense of the lives of the whole people. But it was only justified by the great emergency and was only made necessary by the incredible sense of irresponsible power of the strike leaders. Labor troubles are not to be permanently solved in any such way. Government of the relations between capital and labor by injunction is a solecism. It is an absurdity. Injunctions in labor disputes are merely the emergency brakes for rare use and in case of sudden danger. Frequent application of them would shake to pieces the whole machine.

THE "DAUGHERTY INJUNCTION" AND OTHER INJUNCTIONS IN THE RAILROAD-SHOP-CRAFTS STRIKE OF 1922

This warning, unfortunately, was not heeded either by the employers and employers' associations pressing for injunctions in labor cases or by the Federal courts, which issued these writs whenever presented to them for signature and usually in the precise language suggested by the complainants. As a matter of fact, all of the complaints and practically all of the injunctions follow a stereotyped form. The attorneys for the employers, having access to what is known to lawyers as Martin's Modern Law of Labor Unions, merely copy from the forms used principally in that text.

So that the writ of injunction has become in form almost stereotyped in all of these cases. More and more injunctions were issued in labor disputes by the Federal courts. As Senator Pepper reported in his address to the American Bar Association in 1924, there were nearly 300 injunctions by Federal courts in the railroad-shop-crafts strike of 1922 alone. In that strike also occurred the "Daugherty injunction," which so greatly aroused Senator Pepper, and which, undoubtedly, was the most extreme injunction issued up to that time in any labor dispute by any court. In this injunction, which was issued by Judge Wilkerson in the northern district of Illinois, on motion of Attorney General Daugherty, the Railroad Shop Crafts Federation, its affiliated unions and their officers were enjoined from taking any action whatsoever looking to the further carrying on of this strike.

This "Daugherty injunction" occasioned a storm of protest, not only from labor and progressives, but from leading lawyers and writers on legal subjects. Practically every review published in law magazines condemned this injunction. The general verdict of the legal writers was that expressed by Prof. W. W. Cook, of the Yale Law School, in an article in the Yale Law Journal (vol. 32, pp. 166–171), in which he reviewed the many cases cited by Judge Wilkerson to show that this injunction was in accord with "well-settled law":

> If by "well-settled law" is meant law settled by decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States in cases directly in point, rather than by quotations culled from opinions in cases only more or less analogous, it is believed that not a single one of these propositions can be regarded as a statement of "well-settled law."

RECENT INJUNCTIONS MORE EXTREME

Extreme as was this "Daugherty injunction," injunctions issued since then by Federal courts have been still more extreme. I will cite only a few of these cases, the records upon which were made a part of the hearings on injunctions in labor disputes conducted by the subcommittee of the Committee on the Judiciary.

There has been called to my attention just to-day another injunction somewhat of the character of the injunctions issued in the coal strikes in Pennsylvania and West Virginia. I have in my hand a copy of an injunction issued out of the District Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Kentucky. This injunction was granted on the 28th day of January, 1932.

The defendants in the case in which this injunction was issued, judging from their names, came from the earliest American stock. They had ancestors running back to the very earliest settlement in America. I do not find among the names of those defendants that of a single person who might be regarded as a foreigner, or even the son of an immigrant. Certainly no name among the names of these defendants indicates that a single one of them was a bolshevik, a red, or an anarchist, with one exception, and as to that particular defendant there was no restraining order issued respecting that to which I desire to call the Senate's attention.

Mr. President, all these injunctions are issued in the name of the President of the United States. Every writ is certified under the name of the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States. It is a document which, whenever it comes to the hand of an individual who is not skilled in the legal profession, at once would cause fear and apprehension in his mind. Therefore the simple paper writ of itself carries with it a certain coercion, and oftentimes these injunctions are issued for no other purpose than for the purpose of coercion, and particularly the injunction to which I now call attention. This injunction says, referring to the defendants:

> And each of them is here and now and hereby enjoined and restrained until the further orders of this court are made known herein from remaining on the property of the complainant or in any house or houses thereon.

Note this provision:

> And each of them is now enjoined to remove from said premises with all his or her effects within 10 days from and after the 26th day of January, 1932.

There is a sample of injunctions issued in labor disputes. The laws of the State of Kentucky provide for evictions, unlawful detainer actions may there be entertained, civil actions may be prosecuted to enforce the rights of the employers, and yet those employers resorted to this unusual measure of coercion. They set at naught the laws of the State of Kentucky. Indeed, sir, the employers who are engaged in obtaining some of these injunctions have no hesitancy in asking a court to set aside the Constitution of the United States. Here there is a horrible situation. These men and women are Americans, through whose veins courses the blood of their ancient ancestors. These men and women are driven out in the very midst of the chill of winter, not according to law, not according to the remedies provided for the employers, but driven out notwithstanding the law and notwithstanding the constitutional guaranties of those citizens. This is but a single instance showing the character and degree of abuse that has been exercised in obtaining relief through injunctive process.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BLAINE. I yield.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. What case is the Senator talking about?

Mr. BLAINE. The case I am talking about is Equity No. 1244, in the United States District Court for the Eastern District of Kentucky, in the case of the Straight Creek Coal, Incorporated, complainants, against William Garland et al.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Was interference with interstate commerce involved in this controversy?

Mr. BLAINE. Certainly not with respect to the occupancy of the company houses. I was discussing only that feature of the injunction. I think the whole injunction is an outrage, but I wanted to call to the Senator's attention that particular feature, an injunctive process to enforce civil law, a law relating to eviction, for which there is an adequate remedy at law.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. May I ask the Senator where in this controversy was involved the question of interference with interstate commerce?

Mr. BLAINE. I have not gone into the complaint at all. I know nothing about the complaint. I have not seen it. I have read the provision relating to the eviction of these people to show the abuse which may be made of injunctions, and having nothing whatever to do with commerce.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator another question, in view of what he has stated? Does not the Senator think Congress erred when, in section 4 of the Sherman Antitrust Act, after defining the crime of violation of that act, and fixing a penalty, they gave the courts of equity power and authority to enforce? Does not the Senator think Congress must have some responsibility for injunctions issued under the provisions of section 4 of the Sherman Antitrust Act?

Mr. BLAINE. I would be very glad to answer the Senator directly, but I do not believe it would serve any special purpose in relation to the particular thing I am now discussing, and that is misuse and abuse of injunctions in labor disputes. I would like to proceed along that line, so that I may bring out clearly in a multitude of cases these abuses which are brought about through the injunctive process.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. BLAINE. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I am induced to interrupt the Senator because of the question asked by the Senator from Minnesota about that injunction from which the Senator has read having to do with acts in conflict with interstate commerce. If the Senator will permit me, I would like to call his attention to a particular case where the court held that there was interference with interstate commerce through a certain act which it would take much greater stretch of the imagination to hold had anything to do with interstate commerce.

I refer to what occurred where an injunction had been issued in the case of the Chesapeake & Ohio Railroad against the Brotherhood of Railway Clerks. An injunction was issued whereby the defendants were enjoined from abusing, intimidating, molesting, annoying, insulting, and interfering with persons seeking or obtaining employment with the company. Taliaferro was a barber. He operated a barber shop in the city where this injunction was issued. He put a placard in his window which read, "No scabs wanted here." He was arrested as being in contempt of court by that act; it was held by the judge that his act tended to restrain interstate transportation, and he was fined $200 for contempt of court.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, the decision to which the Senator refers is indeed illuminating. I want to proceed now to a discussion of some of the well-known cases.

CONTEMPT CASE, HITCHMAN COAL & COKE CO. v. LEWIS ET AL., NORTHERN DISTRICT, WEST VIRGINIA, 1922

The first of these cases is the extraordinary contempt action which arose in the northern district of West Virginia in 1922 under the injunction allowed in the oft-quoted Hitchman Coal & Coke Co. case. This case began in 1907 and was premised upon contracts which this company compelled its employees to sign, as a condition of remaining in employment, by which they agreed not to join the United Mine Workers of America. Upon the strength of these so-called contracts, which workingmen appropriately call "yellow-dog contracts," this company sought an injunction prohibiting the United Mine Workers from making any attempt to organize its employees. After a 10-year battle in the courts this company finally, in 1917, got the United States Supreme Court to hold these "yellow-dog contracts" to be valid and secured the injunction it sought. Then, in April, 1922, occurred the nation-wide bituminous-coal strike, which was finally settled by the famous Jacksonville agreement. When this strike began the majority of the employees of the Hitchman Coal & Coke Co. laid down their tools and joined the United Mine Workers. Thereupon the Hitchman Coal & Coke Co., through its attorneys, brought contempt proceedings under the injunction first issued in 1907, which was approved by the United States Supreme Court in 1917, against 26 miners, including the general officers of the United Mine Workers of America.

These union officers were charged with contempt because they had not excluded the employees of the Hitchman Coal & Coke Co. from their call for a general coal strike nor instructed their organizers to make no attempts to get the employees of this company to join in the strike. These general officers were never actually brought before the court, because they kept out of its jurisdiction, but 16 local defendants were on September 5, 1922, found guilty of contempt as charged, in a proceeding which was started by allowing the petition to be amended to give it the form of a citation for criminal contempt on motion of the United States district attorney, although otherwise identical with the petition originally filed by Hitchman Coal & Coke Co., without participation by the United States district attorney. These local defendants were charged with having sought to persuade some of the employees of the Hitchman Coal & Coke Co. to join in the strike—nothing more. In the entire petition there was not one allegation of any act of violence or of any threat of violence, only that the defendants tried to induce the employees of the Hitchman Co. to join in the strike. Judge Baker, however, found all of the defendants guilty of having violated the injunction issued so many years before, fined 6 of them $100 to $250 each, required 5 others to furnish bonds in the sum of $2,000 that they would thereafter faithfully observe the injunction, and ordered these 5 defendants committed to jail until these bonds should be furnished, and required all 16 defendants to sign a stipulation to the effect that they would not again try to get the Hitchman Co. employees to go on strike or join the union nor under any circumstances admit any of these employees to membership in the union. Further, the court required the attorney for these defendants to send an account of these proceedings to the United Mine Workers' Journal, with a warning to the effect that the employees of the Hitchman Coal & Coke Co. must be left strictly alone and must not be allowed to join the union. (For the records in this case, bearing out the account here given, see Senate hearings on limiting the scope of injunctions in labor disputes, 1928, pp. 619–624, and Senate hearings on conditions in the coal fields in Pennsylvania, West Virginia, and Ohio, pp. 2122, 2123.)

ARMSTRONG v. UNITED STATES, DISTRICT OF INDIANA, 1926

The next case to which I direct attention, like the preceding one, also grew out of a "yellow-dog contract." This is the case of Armstrong against United States, a contempt proceeding under an injunction issued by Judge Baltzell to the Indianapolis Street Railway Co. in 1926. Ten years earlier this company signed all of its employees to individual contracts which obligated them not to join any strike and provided that all differences between the company and its employees should be adjusted by the Indiana Public Service Commission. In consideration for this surrender of their right to strike the company promised employment to the signers, subject to its right to discharge them at any time and for any reason. After 10 years of one-sided contracts of this kind the employees grew tired of them, particularly because the company paid its men far below the scale of other cities of the same size. Some of them appealed to the Amalgamated Association of Street Railway Employees for assistance. In consequence of this appeal two union organizers, Armstrong and Parker, came to Indianapolis in the spring of 1926. As former Governor Grosbeck, of Michigan, said in presenting the facts in this case to the Senate committee, these men were "framed" from the day they reached Indianapolis. In the course of 60 days they were arrested fifty-three times on the charge of vagrancy, only to be dismissed in every case. They stuck to their guns, however, and soon organized a local union, of which most of the employees of the street-car company became members. The man who was elected president of this local union, one Boggs, however, was subsequently proven to have been a "spotter" in the company's employ, as were also two members of the organization committee, named Johnson and Young. By June 2, 1926, the union was strong enough to consider a strike for higher wages, which had been refused by the company. To forestall this, the company on this day, through its attorneys, applied to United States Judge Baltzell for a temporary restraining order to forbid the union from undertaking a strike.

Judge Baltzell stated that he did not wish to issue this order ex parte and asked who represented the union. Upon being told that Frank R. Baker was its attorney, he directed that Mr. Baker be brought in. When this was done, the court, after hearing Mr. Baker very briefly, signed the temporary restraining order as drafted by the attorneys for the company. At the same time, Judge Baltzell directed Attorney Baker, as an officer of the court, to go to the union meeting that evening and warn the men that they must not strike. Baker did as he was directed and the strike was averted for a month. In the meantime, on July 3, 1926, the temporary restraining order was replaced by a temporary injunction, after a brief hearing, at which the point at issue seems to have been whether the court could enjoin the men from going on strike. What Judge Baltzell concluded upon this point of law is not clear, because neither at this stage nor any other in this case did he make any findings of fact or write a decision. He did, however, modify this order to the extent of dismissing the case as to all of the defendants, except the two organizers, Armstrong and Parker. Apparently, the court concluded that the men could not be enjoined from striking, but that the organizers were outsiders who might be prohibited from giving any advice or assistance to the men in connection with the contemplated strike.

Two days later the union held a meeting, at which, as previously advertised, a vote was to be taken upon the question of a strike. At this meeting Armstrong and Parker appeared, read the injunction issued against them, stated that under the injunction they could not advise the men whether they should strike, and then withdrew. Thereafter, Boggs, the company spotter, who was president of the union, made a strong plea for going upon strike. He had wormed his way into the confidence of the union, had been elected its president, a direct agent and employee of the street-railway company. He it was, not Armstrong and Parker, the labor organizers, but Boggs, the company's spotter, the spy, who made a strong plea for going upon the strike; whereupon the men voted overwhelmingly to strike.

Here were innocent working men, struggling to obtain some degree of economic independence, who were lashed into a strike by an agent and employee of the street-railway company, and yet the court in this case sentenced, not Boggs, not Johnson or Young, the other two spotters and spies and conspirators, but sentenced Armstrong and Parker to jail, men who had not advised the strike but whose very conduct before that meeting indicated that they were opposed to the strike. That strike was brought about by the company itself. Let us see what happened then.

Within a few days thereafter, Armstrong and Parker were arrested for contempt. The evidence against them consisted of their appearance and statements at the meeting on July 5 and testimony given by the two "spotters" who were members of the organization committee that these union organizers had secretly told them after the injunction had been issued that they should bring about a strike, although a written order to the contrary was given them, as they claimed, "to fool the court."

Upon this evidence of betrayers, spotters, and liars, Judge Baltzell sentenced Armstrong and Parker to jail. Is it any wonder that men who are struggling in industrial employment sometimes see red?

Upon this evidence these organizers—Armstrong and Parker—were found guilty of contempt and sentenced to jail. Subsequently this conviction was affirmed by the Circuit Court of Appeals (18 Fed. (2d) 371), and a writ of certiorari sought by the defendants was denied by the Supreme Court (47 Sup. Ct. 571). Armstrong and Parker served their sentences; the strike was lost; the spotter, Boggs, was caught red-handed in acts of violence and sent to jail, though not sentenced to jail because of his participation in lashing these workers to strike; but no charge of contempt of court was ever brought against the company or its officers or agents who had employed these spotters and spies to engineer the strike against the company. So the company, which was primarily responsible, became the beneficiary of this travesty upon justice. (The available records relating to this case are reproduced in the Hearings on Limiting the Scope of Injunctions in Labor Disputes, pp. 225–282, together with testimony by the attorneys for both parties and the United States district attorney.)

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. McGILL in the chair). Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. BLAINE. I do.

Mr. NORRIS. May I suggest to the Senator from Wisconsin that he print as a part of his remarks the speeches made by Armstrong and the other organizer—Parker, I think—to that meeting? I do not ask him to read those speeches—they are both quite long—but, as the Senator knows, there was a stenographer at the meeting, who took down the speeches, and I suggest that the Senator print them as a part of his remarks.

Mr. BLAINE. In accordance with the suggestion of the Senator from Nebraska, I ask unanimous consent that the two speeches mentioned by him may be inserted in the RECORD as part of my remarks immediately following my discussion of that question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

STATEMENT OF JOHN M. PARKER

Mr. Chairman and brother members, I want to say at the outset that for the information of any of the company stool pigeons who may be assembled in this hall to-night (and there were plenty of them) that I want to serve warning on you one and all to be careful what you report, because we have a court stenographer here taking down every word we are going to say to-night. We are doing that for our own protection so that nobody can go out and make false affidavits about what we have to say.

Now, we are assembled here to-night to make a report to you of what we have tried to do since our last meeting. Since the last meeting was held here a week ago last Wednesday morning, or Thursday morning, we have been to the public-service commission with the cases of 65 discharged men under their so-called agreement, and at that hearing there were, I believe, 31 men who testified that they did not know they had signed an agreement. The attorney general of the State of Indiana, who is the solicitor for the public-service commission of this State, ruled that if the men did not know that they had a contract that there was no contract existed, that there must be a meeting of minds as well as the signing of a paper to constitute a contract, and on those grounds their legal adviser advised the commission they had no jurisdiction to proceed with the case any further unless our attorney, Mr. Baker, would admit that they had a contract. He said he could not do that, because at a vote taken at this meeting or the last meeting held in this hall, there was not anybody who held up their hand saying they had knowingly signed a contract. So that for that reason Mr. Baker would not attempt to recognize the fact that we had a contract.

Now, on coming into this hall to-night—I might state on Wednesday and Thursday we appeared before the public-service commission. On Friday at 10 o'clock, as some of you men well know, we appeared before Judge Baltzell, of the United States court, and heard motions or arguments on motions filed by both the officials and attorneys of the Indianapolis Street Railway Co., and by our attorneys, Mr. Baker and Mr. Bachelder. We had filed two motions, or rather, three motions, one to dismiss the injunction against Brother Armstrong and myself, another to dismiss the one against the Amalgamated Association, of which you men are the members, and another one to dismiss the entire case on account of diversity of citizenship.

So that the judge after hearing the arguments set down next Wednesday for the lawyers of both sides to file briefs, and then give them until the 10th of July to answer each other's briefs and look them over, but after that hearing in court we decided at the suggestion of hundreds of our men that they wanted a meeting to hold a meeting to-night, and immediately the meeting was arranged. Then the company's officials go over to Mr. Baltzell in the Federal court and ask for a hearing yesterday morning, which was granted. Brother Armstrong and myself were sitting in Mr. Baker's office when they called him up to be over at Federal court at 11 o'clock.

So we have tried and exhausted all our efforts to bring about some peaceable settlement for you men. We have been to the governor of the State through the mediator and conciliator of labor, Mr. Dynes; we have been to his worship, Mayor Duvall, on two different occasions. On the last time we were there, last Monday, he dictated a letter to Mr. Todd, requesting him to meet us in conference and settle this question and dispute, and anything that could not be settled to submit it to the public-service commission for arbitration. That has all been refused up to the present time. So that we have nothing in view at the present time to offer you.

At the meeting yesterday in the Federal court is when Judge Baltzell issued a temporary injunction against Brother Armstrong and myself. The deputy marshal served this on us about a half an hour ago in this hall. That was the first intimation we had of it, excepting that Mr. Baker and Mr. Bachelder explained to us yesterday on coming out of court. The deputy marshal who served this on me told me he had been requested—I believe he said by the officials of the street-railway company, or possibly by the court, I do not know which one—to read this injunction to you men. He asked me if I would read it, and in compliance with his request I am going to read this injunction to you men.

I want to say that we are going, as far as Brother Armstrong and myself are concerned—and the advice of the lawyers is that we are the only two that are enjoined—as far as we are concerned, we are going to live up to the letter of the injunction. We have not and are not going to now arbitrarily go against any court orders, because you men realize, I believe, what that means to us. So that we are enjoined by this injunction from advising you, from counseling you, or from in any way intimidating you to leave the service of this company by concerted effort. We are not going to do that. If there was no injunction here, Brother Armstrong or myself would never under our laws assume that obligation. We are not permitted to at least advise you men to strike by our own laws, and I say again we would not do it if there wasn't any injunction here. The question rests entirely with this local organization and not on the advice of Brother Armstrong or myself.

Now, the injunction is as follows:

* * * * * * *

Mr. BLAINE. Then Mr. Parker read the injunction and proceeded to speak.

Now, that is the injunction as handed to us by the Federal marshals, deputy marshal, and, as I promised these marshals that I would read this injunction, I have read it, and it is a matter of record as to whether I have read it correctly and truly or not.

So that I am not going to take up very much more of your time. I am going to say this to you, that our attorneys, Mr. Bachelder and Mr. Baker, have informed us, and which the injunction reads, that we are the plaintiffs, Brother Armstrong and myself—or the defendants, rather—that we are enjoined from advising, from soliciting you, or in any manner whatsoever trying to intimidate you to do anything. I say again we are going to live up to that order. We are not going, or wouldn't, if there wasn't an injunction here, advise you men either to strike or not to strike. There has never been a mention made in this hall or any other hall by Brother Armstrong or myself up to the present time about a strike. They have said on different occasions, on the 2d of June, over a month ago, they got a temporary restraining order that we were going to strike. We had no intention of striking, because at that time we only had about 750 men. We had been perfecting this organization for the last month, and if I am any judge of human nature, by God, it is pretty near perfected.

Now, as I said, I don't think it is necessary for me to go into the injunction any further. Brother Baker this evening is unavoidably absent. He had made arrangements prior to this meeting to take his family to some lake—and I guess it would be a good place to go to, up around some lake—and won't be back, I don't expect, until to-morrow morning, but he informed us very specifically that as long as we did not advise or counsel you men in any way, shape, or form that they could not cite us for contempt of this order, and Brother Armstrong and myself are going to be very, very careful.

We are not going to give anybody an opportunity to be cited for contempt of court. We are trying to live up to the law; we have lived up to the law. But I just want to correct a few statements that has been made, and seeing is believing. We have been told by at least 50 men to-night in this hall that the company's supervisors and even the superintendent, Mr. Tretton, if you please, has informed some of you men that Parker and Armstrong have left this city. Well, Brother Armstrong is sitting here, and I am Johnnie Parker, and we haven't left the city. As far as I know, we have no intention of leaving this city for some time. We are getting pretty well acquainted in this city. We are complying with the law. The best I can say to you on that is that between the six or seven of us here we have been arrested fifty-three times and never convicted. So that we must have been to a certain degree complying with the law, and we intend to continue to comply with the law. So I want to say to you men that the men who told you that Parker and Armstrong had left the city that they were telling them for the purpose of discouraging you men from coming to this meeting; but I say that I don't think, on looking over this vast multitude of street-car men, that they scared very many, or not very many did believe Parker and Armstrong had left, or else you came out here to see whether we had or not.

Now, we are going to remain here; but as far as this meeting is concerned, as far as this injunction is concerned, we are not going to say anything to you or advise you in any way, shape, form, or manner, either by speech or written statement as to what you are going to do.

This injunction calls for our agents, and I say we have no agents. The only two that are here now is Brother Armstrong and myself, and Mr. Frank P. Baker is our agent, as far as law is concerned. So that we are the only three on the interpretation of the lawyers.

I don't know anything about the interpretation of this injunction any more than to read it, but I say this, that I have read more injunctions than Bill Latta or Watson, and I say without fear of contradiction, Mr. Judge Baltzell himself. I know something about injunctions. I have got a bushel basket full of them home, if anybody wants to look them over, and it doesn't worry me very much. I never violated any injunction, never was cited for contempt of an injunction; and I want to say to you men that I have been broadcasted over this city that I was indicted for dynamiting. I have a telegram in my grip in the hotel about three weeks ago stating those charges had been wiped off the books. So that I am not indicted at the present time for anything, but on the contrary, Mr. Latta, your attorney, if I am correctly informed, is indicted at the present time for embezzlement of State funds.

We want to comply with every provision of the courts of this State and this country, but we are not going to be bluffed, if you please, by any supervisors or minor superintendents.

We have been in your midst for about three months—I have—and Brother Armstrong has been here three and a half months. And we have not yet done anything in this city contrary to law, or we haven't told any lies to you street-car men. I know street-car men too well; I know their environments, and I think I can read the expression on their faces. If you men have all got contracts and you are perfectly satisfied to work under those conditions, then I might ask the question, "What are you doing here to-night?"

The agreements as quoted in part of this injunction states that you have an opportunity of seeing the superintendent of transportation on the first and fourth Tuesdays of the month, and on the third Tuesday of the month you have an opportunity to see the president of the company. Then after 10 days you have the golden opportunity of going to the public-service commission, and their decision shall be final. Now, a man working at 37 cents an hour that has got to wait for six weeks to find out whether he is going to be reinstated or not that is a one-sided contract, if there be such a thing. I don't know how men can live and exist for six weeks on 37 cents an hour when they don't get it. I don't know how they can exist on it when they do get it. I know it would take at least $31 a week to feed Joe Fort, let alone dress him.

So now, brothers, I am going to quit and give Brother Armstrong an opportunity to say something to you. I have tried to make my position clear. I don't want anybody to misquote me in this hall. I say I am going to live up to every letter in that contract as interpreted to me by our attorneys, who we are paying good money to for that advice. If somebody wants to make an affidavit that we have counseled you men to-night, then they can cite us for contempt of court. If they cite us for contempt of court, we will take our medicine; but I don't think they are going to do it; and if Judge Baltzell rules against us, you can take this message back to the judge: That we are going to appeal from his decision; we are not going to take his decision on it.

So that is the case as it stands. I have nothing to advise you, nothing to counsel you on. I have kept my promise with the deputy marshal, I have read this document to you. Brother Armstrong may explain it further, or do as he sees fit, but I maintain that I have kept within the confines of the law of this State and this country.

I thank you.

STATEMENT OF ROBERT B. ARMSTRONG

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. Chairman and brother members, Brother Parker has, I think, explained to you our position very thoroughly, and I do not want to violate any laws in any land. He has explained this injunction to you, as our attorney has interpreted it to us. Our attorney, Mr. Baker, informed us that the judge dismissed the restraining order against the amalgamated association and then issued this temporary injunction against Brother Parker and myself, that leaving you men out of this injunction, or, that is what our attorney tells us.

There have been many laws violated in this town since Brother Parker and I came here, but that would not justify us in violating laws. I have respect for the Federal courts. If we didn't have, this country would be in a very sad condition. Regardless of what I may think of the injunction, I am going to abide by it to the best of my ability. I don't know anything about law, but I do know what our attorney has told us that this injunction means.

Now, to go back, brothers, some three and a half months ago, one of the brothers that came into this hall reminded me of about what I am to say. When I met him here in March after I had been instructed to come to this city by our international president because a number of the street-railway employees had requested that some one come here and assist them in formulating an organization, and at the time I talked to several of the brothers here—one of them reminded me of it this evening at the time I was talking to him. At that time we didn't have a member of the Amalgamated Association in this city, and to look over these hundreds of faces here to-night is indeed a pleasure to me, for in securing this membership we have withstood every insult and hardship that could be heaped upon us, and as the Mr. Mayor told us the other day, that there had been enough things said and done to us to cause any man to rise up against it. He knows well what this police department has done here. They have done everything they possibly can, not the patrolmen themselves, but their wonderful chief, Claude Johnson, has done everything that he possibly can to drive us out of this town. We have told you those things before, but we want you to remember it. We have come here and we have withstood those insults for the benefit of the street-car men of Indianapolis, and as Brother Parker told you a few moments ago, it was reported, "Yes; there have been 50 men told me to-night that superintendents and supervisors had told them that Parker and Armstrong had left town." That was old man Parker that addressed you a moment ago, and now it is me.

So I am in the same position as Brother Parker. I have no intention and will not violate any part of that injunction. I want those who are going to go back and report—I am repeating that so many times, for the stool pigeons who will come in here and take reports back to his company are so dumb it must be repeated several times—for they have made false affidavits; that is, they sweared to a lie—but what can you expect? I would expect them to do anything.

So I will say to you men that if you are not intelligent enough to know what you want and when you want it, how am I going to learn you men—for you are all over 21.

Now, I feel that the membership of this organization should discuss their own ills, if they have any; and if you haven't any ills don't discuss them, for if you talk to a person about looking bad the first thing you know he is going to be sick if there is nothing wrong with him.

So I feel that under the circumstances it is our duty to turn this meeting over to the membership; and, as Mr. Baker informs us, they are at liberty to discuss any matter that may come before your meeting; and, as I stated a moment ago, I know that you men know what you want and when you want it; and as far as Brother Parker or I leaving this town, Robert I. Todd and his whole company hasn't got enough money to get us half way to the Union Station.

And just a closing remark, brothers, and as we have told you before—that we never came to this town and we aren't going away—and I will repeat my hopes, that when we do leave that the street-car men of Indianapolis have got one of the best local divisions that is in the Amalgamated Association.

Mr. BLAINE. Now, Mr. President, I want to proceed to the discussion briefly of two of the many injunctions issued by the Federal courts in the coal strike which was investigated by a committee of the Senate during my term in this body.

PITTSBURGH TERMINAL CORPORATION v. UNITED MINE WORKERS OF AMERICA ET AL. (W. D. PA., 1927)

The first of these was issued by Judge Schoonmaker in the western district of Pennsylvania, upon the application of the Pittsburgh Terminal Coal Corporation against the United Mine Workers. In this case an ex parte temporary restraining order was issued on September 30, 1927, which was continued as a temporary injunction on October 11, 1927. On this occasion Judge Schoonmaker wrote an opinion to the effect that the coal strike is illegal under the Federal antitrust laws. He did not, however, go so far as to enjoin the continuance of the strike, but placed many obstacles in the union's way in carrying on this strike. Time will permit the citing of only one of the many remarkable prohibitions in this injunction, which is reprinted in full in the Senate Injunction Hearings, pages 407–409. This is the clause prohibiting the United Mine Workers "from disbursing any funds for any further appeal bonds, attorney services, court costs, or otherwise for the purpose of enabling, aiding, encouraging, or procuring any person to occupy against the plaintiff's will any such mining houses of plaintiff."

This clause was inserted to prevent the union from assisting its members—the striking miners—in their fight in the State courts to prevent the eviction of their families from the houses they occupied. In this instance the Federal court even undertook to interfere with the administration of justice in the State courts. Thus the miners were prevented from availing themselves of the remedies against eviction accorded them by State law, and they were ruthlessly evicted at the approach of winter. They and their families were forced to live in barracks under conditions which aroused the indignation of the Senate members of the Interstate Commerce Committee, who visited the coal fields under the resolution for an investigation introduced by the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON], although many of the company houses had been standing vacant. The chairman of the committee, I think, yesterday discussed some of the phases of that injunction.

CLARKSON COAL MINING CO. v. UNITED MINE WORKERS ET AL. (S. D. OHIO, 1927)

In the case of Clarkson Coal Mining Co. against United Mine Workers, in the adjoining southern district of Ohio, Judge Hough went Judge Schoonmaker one better in the matter of the eviction of the families of the striking miners from company houses. Judge Schoonmaker prohibited the union from assisting the miners in fighting evictions. Judge Hough ordered the miners to get out of the houses by a specified date, and no doubt that very injunction gave rise to the injunction to which I called attention not long ago in the Kentucky case.

In his decision in support of this novel order (23 Fed. (2d) 208) Judge Hough acknowledged that the mining company had an adequate remedy in the State courts to get the striking miners out of these houses, but he held that since the case was before him in equity he was duty bound to order the miners to vacate the houses, because no other remedy was available to the complainants in his particular court.

I call attention to injunctive proceedings of this kind to indicate that there must be a remedy against these abuses, and that remedy must come from the Congress of the United States.

The injunction which Judge Hough issued in this case had other provisions equally novel and questionable. (For the complete text of this injunction see Senate injunction hearings, pp. 550–556.) It contains what are probably the most detailed and drastic restrictions ever imposed upon picketing. These included not only that the names of the pickets and their actions should be reported daily to the marshal, but also that none but American citizens might be employed as pickets. Yet, in the same order, the court directed the marshal to publish this injunction in the Italian and Polish languages, as well as in English, because, presumably, many of the strikers were aliens, unable to read English. The court would not permit a person who could speak the language of the men who were on strike to act as a picket. Mr. President, if the court had had the first conception of a proper method for the preservation of law and order, he would have directed that among those acting as pickets should be included men who could speak the language of the great number of the men who were on strike.

Still another remarkable provision in this injunction was a direction to the marshal to call to his assistance and deputize such persons as he deemed necessary to protect the property of the complainants. Such usurpation by the courts of executive authority has heretofore been deemed unlawful, and a request for a similar order was refused by Judge Schoonmaker in the Pittsburgh Terminal Coal Corporation case, but deputy marshals guarded the property of the nonunion operators in Ohio under this order of Judge Hough for many months.

And there the administrative and executive departments were set at naught; the power that resides in the executive department to see that the laws are observed was set aside; the constitution of the State was disregarded; every fundamental right of the State necessary to preserve law and order was thrown aside. The court undertook to administer not only the judicial function but also the legislative and executive functions of government, including that of State government.

Judge Hough justified his many novel and extreme orders in an interview published in the Baltimore Sun on February 28, 1928, which is no less remarkable than the injunction itself. In this interview the judge called his injunction "the big stick published in the form of regulations," and said:

> Now, relief was needed in this matter, and when you are going to give relief, it's got to be described in rhetoric that means something. You've got to make it sense in order to get results.

When told that he seemed to be handling the matter more as a soldier than as a judge, he said:

> That's just what it calls for. I know all about these things. I've been in every coal strike for 30 years and in every rank from captain to colonel. Put teeth in the order, have them understand it thoroughly and then, as things go along nicely, give them all the liberality possible under the order. But always have your regulations to fall back on in case things don't go so nicely.

Is not that remarkable language, dispassionate, judicial? Yet that is the language of a court. It is possible under the present law of procedure in these cases. That was the attitude of that court; and, as I have suggested, the order of the court was to set aside all the functions of every other department of government having the responsibility to see that the law was properly enforced.

How the high-handed course of this judge has actually worked out was disclosed in testimony given to the Senate Interstate Commerce Committee by Mr. Ezra Van Horn, vice president of the Clarkson Coal Mining Co., the complainant in this case. Mr. Van Horn inserted in the record in the Hearings on Conditions in the Coal Fields of Pennsylvania, West Virginia, and Ohio (pp. 2249–50) a list of acts of violence, as reported by a local newspaper, which have occurred in this one place in the coal strike. Now, note: After the judge had taken unto himself the executive power, within which is embraced the power of the militia—after taking unto himself these powers, this list of disturbances embraces more than 50 separate acts of violence. It includes numerous dynamitings and assaults. Nearly all of these acts occurred after August 15, 1927, the date of the temporary restraining order of Judge Hough; yet not one person has been punished for contempt.

Mr. President, is it any wonder that the judiciary is losing its standing among men and women? Is there anyone who believes that these acts do not reflect most seriously upon the judiciary, not only the single judge alone, but the whole judicial system of the United States? These acts have a direct tendency to undermine the very foundations of our Government; and, as Judge Taft and former President Taft, late Chief Justice of the United States, said, if permitted to go on, would rattle the whole machine to pieces.

If anyone believes that injunctions are effective in preserving law and order in strikes, he has but to examine this list of acts of violence which followed the most drastic attempt of record to prevent such acts by injunctions.

ALLEN A CO. v. STEELE ET AL. (E. D. WIS. 1928)

Now, Mr. President, I desire to discuss an injunction that was issued in my own State. It also will demonstrate the futility of the injunctive process in preserving law or order.

This is the case in which Judge Geiger, of the eastern district of Wisconsin, on March 8, 1928, allowed an injunction to the Allen A Co. of Kenosha, Wis., against its striking employees, members of the American Full Fashioned Hosiery Workers' Union. This injunction did not contain novel prohibitions like those in the other cases I have discussed; in fact, it may fairly be described as a typical labor injunction, without special features of any kind. For this reason it seems to me to be worth while to set forth in some detail the procedure followed in this case, and the order which was issued.

This case arose in connection with a strike in a hosiery factory which involved between 200 and 300 men and girls—a great many young girls. This strike was brought on when the employing company could not get the knitters to consent to operate two machines each, instead of one, and then gave notice that thereafter it would operate its factory on a strictly nonunion basis, and that each employee would have to sign an individual contract in which he was required to state that he did not belong to any union and would not join any union. When this company took this position its employees struck, practically to a man. The strike was entirely peaceful; there was picketing, but no violence. Then, on March 8, attorneys for this company, without any notice to the union, went to Federal Judge Geiger in Milwaukee—40 miles away—and presented a complaint to him which was full of recitals about conspiracy and anticipated trouble, but contained nothing concrete in support of these allegations, other than that the employees were on strike and that there was picketing. With this complaint they presented some affidavits to the same general effect; and they handed the judge a temporary restraining order for signature, which he promptly signed, in the form in which presented.

The Allen A Co. has no factory other than this plant at Kenosha, but is a Delaware corporation. On this excuse it brought its complaint in the Federal courts instead of the State courts, which exist and are functioning in Kenosha, where this strike occurred. The real reason for bringing this case in the Federal courts, however, was apparently that under the laws of Wisconsin no temporary restraining order could issue in a labor case except upon at least 48 hours' notice to the adverse party (Wisconsin Statutes, 1927, S. 268.05). The Wisconsin laws, moreover, provide that there shall be a jury trial in all cases of indirect criminal contempt arising under labor injunctions (S. 133.07), and, further, that it shall be legal for strikers to recommend, advise, or persuade others to refrain from working at a place where a strike is in progress (S. 343.683). It was to get around these Wisconsin statutes that this corporation applied to the Federal courts; and, as events showed, it was by this means able to get a more drastic injunction than any Wisconsin corporation could have secured in a State court.

As I have already stated, the restraining order which Judge Geiger signed (and this was later continued as a temporary injunction, after a hearing upon the pleadings, without oral examination of any witnesses) contained no novel clauses or anything unusual. It did, however, enjoin all picketing and all assembling on the streets near the plaintiff's factory, although the United States Supreme Court in the American Steel Foundries Co. case—the Tri-city case—held that strikers may station "missionaries" about a factory, to peacefully persuade the new employees to join them in the strike. This injunction, further, is profuse in what are known as "blanket clauses," such as "from doing any acts or things whatever in furtherance of any conspiracy or combination among the defendants or any of them to obstruct or interfere with the plaintiff, its officers, agents, or employees in the free and unrestrained control and operation of its property, plant, and business." Such clauses may be practically without legal effect, but are clearly designed to give the strikers the impression that they can do nothing whatsoever in furtherance or continuance of their strike without running the risk of being cited for contempt.

Therein lies the power of coercion, perhaps not so much because of the wording of the injunction but because of the indefiniteness of the injunction.

Briefly, I desire to outline something about what has happened in this case since Judge Geiger issued his injunction. As is so often the case, the issuance of the injunction served only to inflame passions. There have been arrests under State laws of strikers on charges of disorderly conduct, unlawful assembly, assault, and malicious mischief, and arrests of strike breakers for assaults and for carrying concealed weapons. Twenty-six strikers were arrested charged with contempt by conspiring to violate the injunction. There has not been a single conviction of a striker by a jury, although there is not one Kenosha factory that is unionized. In the contempt case in which conspiracy was charged the 26 strikers also were promptly acquitted, because a jury trial had to be granted under the Clayton Act, as conspiracy is a crime under the Wisconsin statutes.

This is, I believe, the story of a typical Federal injunction—of the intervention of the Federal courts in a labor dispute—which, instead of promoting peace and law and order, has served to intensify the bitterness of the struggle. It is a case in which the Federal courts appear in the unenviable rôle of assisting an employer to compel his employees to surrender their right to belong to a labor union and to sign "yellow-dog contracts." Under the circumstances, it is not surprising that the Wisconsin Federation of Labor has issued a pamphlet upon Judicial Despotism, in which it denounces the Federal courts as the allies of capital.

OTHER FEDERAL INJUNCTIONS

Mr. President, I could go on indefinitely and discuss other injunctions in labor cases issued by the Federal courts in recent years. I do not want to pursue this course; but I do desire to draw attention to the case of the Bedford Cut Stone Co., reported in 274 United States, page 37, in which the United States Supreme Court held unlawful the refusal of journeymen stonecutters to set stone which had been cut by firms which had locked out and blacklisted members of the same union—a decision of which Justice Brandeis in his dissenting opinion, concurred in by Justice Holmes, said:

> If on the undisputed facts in this case, refusal to work can be enjoined, Congress created by the Sherman law and the Clayton Act an instrument for imposing restraints upon labor which reminds of involuntary servitude.

Or I might take up the long list of cases in which Federal courts have issued sweeping temporary restraining orders without notice to the defendants, and then, after a hearing, dissolved or radically modified these orders because they found them to have been unwarranted, either upon the facts or on grounds of law, but after they had done their mischief. Or I might profitably take up the usual procedure in these cases, which Judge Amidon, of the United States District Court of North Dakota, described and criticized in his decision in the case of Great Northern Ry. Co. v. Brosseau (286 Fed. 414 (1923)), which I recommend everyone to read who has any doubt upon the necessity for reform in these labor injunction cases.

I need not take up any more time in describing existing abuses, because even the attorneys for the employers' associations made no real denial of these practices. These abuses are so patent, that, as former Secretary of Labor DAVIS, now a distinguished Member of the Senate, has said, "This situation calls for action by Congress."

REMEDIES PROPOSED

I now come to the bill which our committee has recommended. I do not intend to go into detail upon the provisions of this bill, the constitutionality thereof, or the reasons for the inclusion of each item and the wording employed.

This bill is not a complete labor code. It does not set forth all of the laws applicable to injunctions in labor disputes. It does not repeal the labor sections of the Clayton Act but merely supplements these provisions and clarifies the intent of Congress.

It is drawn upon the theory that Congress has authority to define and limit the jurisdiction of the Federal courts, other than the original jurisdiction conferred upon the Supreme Court by the Constitution. All inferior Federal courts are created by law and it is within the power of Congress to prescribe their jurisdiction. This power has heretofore been exercised on numerous occasions, and has often been recognized by the Supreme Court.

Proceeding upon this theory, this bill defines and limits the jurisdiction of the Federal courts in the issuance of injunctions in cases involving and growing out of labor disputes. It limits this jurisdiction both with reference to the situations in which injunctions may be issued and the procedure which must be followed. I am aware that there is some language in the majority opinion in Truax v. Corrigan (157 U. S. 312) which, apart from its context, can be interpreted as holding that it is a violation of the "equal protection" clause of the Constitution to prescribe any limitations upon the jurisdiction of the courts in cases involving or growing out of labor disputes which do not apply to all other controversies. Such a doctrine would make this entire bill unconstitutional, except the section for jury trial in cases of contempts, which applies not only to labor cases but to all other injunction cases as well. But this language in Truax against Corrigan can not be taken to have settled this point, especially in view of the fact that the Supreme Court has often recognized that the relations of employers and employees are fundamentally different from those between other buyers and sellers. I can not believe that when the question is squarely presented to the Supreme Court it will hold that cases involving and growing out of labor disputes can not be placed in a separate category, as, for instance, patent cases now are in a separate category, both as to substantive law and procedure.

Moreover, Mr. President, I think there is a long line of decisions indicating that the power of Congress extends to the regulation respecting the jurisdiction and procedure in United States courts other than the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FESS in the chair). Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. BLAINE. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. Before the Senator leaves the Truax case, I think, speaking about the decision, he ought to state that in that case four members of the Supreme Court dissented. It was a 5 to 4 decision. Also that the real question involved was the constitutionality of a statute of the State of Arizona, which was held by the five judges to be unconstitutional because, they said, it conflicted with the thirteenth amendment, which, as a matter of fact, has application to the rights of States and State legislatures, and not to the power of Congress to legislate.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, I join in the statement of the Senator from Nebraska. I had not intended to discuss the question of constitutionality. I think there has been outlined by one of the distinguished lawyers of the United States, a former Member of Congress, John W. Davis, a whole series of cases to the proposition that the power rests with Congress to fix the jurisdiction and limit the procedure of the United States courts other than the Supreme Court of the United States; and if it becomes necessary, I will take the privilege on some other occasion when this bill is under debate to present those authorities, together with other cases which point quite definitely to the conclusion stated by the Senator from Nebraska.

After careful consideration of the point to which I have just referred, namely, as to whether the Supreme Court would not hold that labor cases might be put in a separate category, our committee reached the conclusion that all that this bill provides is within the power of Congress. Moreover, this bill provides expressly that if any provision shall be held unconstitutional in its application to any person or circumstance, the remainder of the act and its application to other persons or circumstances shall not be affected thereby.

DECLARATION OF PUBLIC POLICY

I come now to the substantive provisions of the bill, and, first, to the declaration of public policy in section 2. This presents, at the same time, a rule of interpretation and a statement of the underlying thought of Congress in the enactment of this legislation. This will be, when adopted, a declaration by Congress of the necessity for labor organizations and the right of workingmen to freely associate and to be represented in negotiations concerning the terms and conditions of employment by representatives of their own choice. The fact that workingmen, under present-day conditions, must associate to exercise actual freedom of contract has often been asserted by the courts and never in better or clearer language than in the unanimous opinion, written by Chief Justice Taft, in the American Steel Foundries case (257 U. S. 184).

All through that decision repeatedly it is set forth what ought to be the public policy; I am not speaking of what is or ought to be the law, but the public policy of the United States, and the whole opinion contains various expressions and declarations on that very question.

"YELLOW-DOG" CONTRACTS

There has been much lip service in the past to these fundamental rights of free labor, but only too often it has ended there. These rights have been acclaimed in the very decisions which have sanctioned the complete denial of all freedom of association through "yellow-dog" contracts. Under this bill an attempt is made to outlaw the "yellow-dog" contract; at least that it shall not be enforced by injunction.

The rapid spread of such individual contracts in which workingmen agree not to join any labor union or ever to go on strike is the most alarming development in industrial relations in this country in recent years. Such "yellow-dog" contracts seem to be almost universal in nonunion coal fields and have also come into widespread use in the metal trades and other industries, and now they have spread to the railroads. Whenever any labor trouble occurs or is threatened, the employers bring forth these "yellow-dog" contracts. If the employees will not sign them, and go on strike, the strike breakers are signed to these contracts, so that the employer can get an injunction prohibiting the strikers from making any attempt to get the new men to join them.

I want to read for the RECORD the contents of a "yellow-dog" contract. This relates to the railroads. I understand that the Great Northern, the Northern Pacific, the Burlington, and practically all the southwest roads, and many of the southeastern and eastern roads, have now with certain crafts the "yellow-dog" contract. I read from the contract demanded by the Great Northern Railway Co. It is as follows:

> The undersigned applicant for employment by the Great Northern Railway Co. as ——— ——— (or at present employed), in consideration of the granting or continuance of such employment, hereby states and represents to the Great Northern Railway Co. that he is not a member of or affiliated with the International Association of Machinists; the International Brotherhood of Boilermakers, Iron Ship Builders, and Helpers of America; the International Brotherhood of Blacksmiths and Helpers; the Amalgamated Sheet Metal Workers International Alliance; the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers; or the Brotherhood Railway Carmen of America, and agrees that during the entire period of such employment he will not apply for membership in, or become a member of, or affiliate with, or lend any support, financial or otherwise, to any of said organizations. Upon the failure of the undersigned to comply with the foregoing agreement in every respect, it is agreed that this may be treated by the Great Northern Railway Co. as a resignation from its employment and that such employment shall immediately cease.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. BLAINE. Certainly.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The form of contract to which the Senator has now directed our attention excludes certain specific organizations. The more common form is quite general in its terms; that is, the agreement is that the person seeking employment will not join any union or, if he is a member of the union, that he will discontinue his membership.

Mr. BLAINE. The Senator is absolutely accurate in that statement. I used the form from which I just read because the railroad companies are now almost universally attempting to sign their men up to the "yellow-dog" contract, and particularly the railroad crafts outside of the four large brotherhoods, which brotherhoods of course have such economic strength that the railroads have not seen fit to interfere with any of their organizations.

Mr. HEBERT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. BLAINE. Certainly.

Mr. HEBERT. It is my understanding that those brotherhoods are protected by law. As the Senator read the form of contract, to which he referred as the "yellow-dog" contract, I did not hear any reference to any railroad brotherhoods mentioned there, so that a man if he went into the employ of a railroad would be free to enter that union which had control of the particular activity in which the applicant would be engaged.

Mr. BLAINE. He would not be free to enter any of the organizations set forth in the form of contract from which I have read. I understand that there are about 23 of these crafts, and I understand this form of contract embraces all 23 of those crafts. Those crafts are outside of the four larger brotherhoods. I think I am correct in that; I am quite certain that I am.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, the Senator is correct. I can see the point the Senator from Rhode Island has in his mind, that a member of any of the crafts mentioned in the contract which the Senator from Wisconsin read could apply for and become a member of any one of the four brotherhood organizations not mentioned. That is true because those particular brotherhoods are not mentioned here and there is no such contract presented to them to sign.

But the contract read by the Senator from Wisconsin is presented to everyone who is performing duties for the railroad company that are performed by the particular organization mentioned. In other words, a machinist, for instance, who is going to work for a railroad company as a machinist would have to sign the contract which the Senator from Wisconsin has read or he could not work as a machinist. If he were a member of one of the big brotherhoods, a conductor or an engineer, there would not be anything of that kind presented to him. But as to all the other organizations the Senator read that are included in the contract, anyone performing any of those duties would have to sign a contract in order to get a job with the railroads, as the Senator has stated.

Mr. HEBERT. I have no definite recollection, but I do remember a case which was decided by the Supreme Court sustaining the right of employees of railroads to maintain their union and enjoining the railroad company from establishing company unions.

Mr. NORRIS. That was the Hutchinson case just recently coming up from Texas.

Mr. HEBERT. Did that involve these contracts? I do not remember the details, but it was my impression that it did involve employees of railroads outside of the four brotherhoods. So that notwithstanding this contract was entered into, under that decision of the Supreme Court it would be void, would it not? In the light of the decision of the Supreme Court which gave to these organizations the right to assemble together and not to be interfered with by the railroad management, it would seem to me that this contract henceforth would be void.

I want to ask the Senator another question, if he will pardon me. Is that contract now made use of by the railroads? I mean, is it made use of at the present time, or was it made use of only in the past?

Mr. BLAINE. It is made use of at the present time to a very large extent. This form of contract originated prior to March, 1929.

But my understanding of the Texas case, Mr. President, is that it does not go to the question of the validity of the "yellow-dog" contracts. Another question peculiar to that case was involved, as I recall. I do not want to enter upon a discussion of that question at this time, but I shall call attention to some decisions of the Supreme Court which have validated and made enforceable the "yellow-dog" contract.

Also permit me to say in connection with the railroad craftsmen that those covered by the crafts set forth in the copy of the "yellow-dog" contract which I read, blacksmiths, machinists, car repairmen, and men possessing that particular ability and skill—there being 23 organizations of that character, I believe—are practically being forced out of their unions. The fact is that to-day, outside of the four larger brotherhoods known as the "big four," the craft organizations of the railroads are very rapidly disappearing due to the execution or the demand for the execution of the "yellow-dog" contract along substantially the lines of the form of contract I have read.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield further to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. BLAINE. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator knows just as well as I do, from the hearings we have held, that the legality or the constitutionality of the so-called "yellow-dog" contract has been one of the vital issues all the way through the hearings, and that those who have opposed the bill have strenuously insisted that the "yellow-dog" contract is legal and is constitutional, and that we could not outlaw it by an act of Congress. They are insisting upon that now. As I understood the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. HEBERT], in his contention in the committee, and I presume it will be the same here, he contends that the "yellow-dog" contract can not be outlawed and will not be outlawed by the bill because the bill will be held unconstitutional in that respect.

Mr. HEBERT. Mr. President, if the Senator from Wisconsin will permit me——

Mr. BLAINE. Certainly.

Mr. HEBERT. I based my action in considering that phase of the bill upon the decisions of the Supreme Court itself. Every time the court has passed upon that contract it has held it to be a valid agreement.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. HEBERT. I assume the Senator is aware that I prepared a substitute which will be presented here in which I think I have suggested a way to afford all the relief that labor organizations will want from the so-called "yellow-dog" contract, and yet we need not interfere with the decisions of the court by prohibiting the court from making them the basis for an injunction. I shall have occasion to discuss that question later.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not want the Senator from Rhode Island to get the idea now that I am criticizing either him or any of the other eminent lawyers who appeared before the committee and argued that we could not outlaw the "yellow-dog" contract. We realized when we were framing the bill that we had perhaps a difficult task to so frame it that it would be constitutional and would still outlaw the "yellow-dog" contract. I concede frankly that the courts have sustained the "yellow-dog" contract as a rule. Our attempt was to get around those decisions and to get around them within the limits of our constitutional authority. I have not any doubt at all that we have succeeded in doing it in the bill now before us.

Mr. HEBERT. If the Senator from Wisconsin will pardon a further interruption——

Mr. BLAINE. Certainly.

Mr. HEBERT. I am free to say that if any way can be devised to outlaw the "yellow-dog" contract I am going to travel that way. I have repeatedly said that, and I want to emphasize it at this time. It was emphasized in the report of the minority of the Judiciary Committee which I had a hand in preparing, and we have gone some distance in the substitute bill which will be considered by the Senate in due time.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, the policy of the employers who demand the signing of the "yellow-dog" contract is to call such contracts the "American plan," but anything more utterly contrary to the first principles of American liberty can scarcely be imagined. This is not a question of the open shop, but one whether employers shall dictate every phase of the life of their employees. "Yellow-dog" contracts threaten the complete extinction of labor unions and the elimination of all effective opposition to dictation of terms and conditions of employment by the employers. It would not be tolerated for a moment if employers compelled all their employees to sign contracts that they would not belong to some lodge or to some particular church, or that they will vote the Republican ticket, and then took out injunctions to keep everybody from even approaching these employees to get them to change. The principle involved, however, is the same. If employers can, through such a method, prevent their employees from belonging to labor unions, they can also prevent them from belonging to any church or lodge, or, in fact, doing anything, either in or out of working hours, that they do not like.

I notice the Senator from Nebraska smiles when I make reference to voting the Republican ticket. I thought the reference appropriate.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I think it is quite appropriate. I am inclined to think, from what I have heard about some polls which have been taken at different places in the United States, that some of the Federal judges may issue an injunction that will prevent a man from changing his political beliefs or policies or votes.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, the principle is identically the same.

Mr. NORRIS. It is just the same.

Mr. BLAINE. If employers can, through such methods, prevent their employees from belonging to labor unions, they can also prevent them from belonging to any church or any lodge, or, in fact, doing anything either in or out of working hours that they do not like. It is an economic power possessed by the employers against which nothing can prevail unless the Congress can outlaw the "yellow-dog" contract, at least as an instrument for equity relief by the injunctive process.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield further to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. BLAINE. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. While the particular contract the Senator has read is in discussion, for fear that those who may read the Senator's speech in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and for fear that Senators who are listening might get the idea that the contract in question is a fair sample, I think it ought to be called to the attention of the Senate and the country that "yellow-dog" contracts which the committee discovered in its investigation of the labor situation were much worse than the particular one the Senator has read. In other words, starting with the Hitchman case, in that instance the contract was very mild, but still the principle was involved, and it having been affirmed and approved by the Supreme Court, the employers then continued to put into their contracts other provisions and stipulations, which were much worse than those the Senator has read. Based upon the decision in the Hitchman case, the courts approved them, so that the ordinary "yellow-dog" contract involved in the cases that have come before the committee contains a great many other provisions that are more obnoxious and worse than the provisions the Senator has read.

Mr. BLAINE. There is no doubt about that. There is some refinement in the "yellow-dog" contract demanded by the railroad companies.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; there is.

Mr. BLAINE. The United States Supreme Court, in the Hitchman Coal & Coke Co. case (245 U. S. 229), in 1917 placed its stamp of approval upon such "yellow-dog" contracts, but no argument was presented to the court to show the farreaching consequences of its decision. I want to discuss that suggestion.

The court felt that this question had been settled by the earlier Adair (208 U. S. 161) and Coppage (236 U. S. 1) cases, which held invalid laws making it a criminal offense for employers to discriminate against workingmen because of union membership or to enter into nonunion contracts. There is a world of difference, however, between making it a criminal offense to enter into such contracts and merely providing that such contracts shall be unenforceable, as does section 3 of this bill.

It is believed that this point was not adequately considered by the Supreme Court in the Hitchman Coal & Coke Co. case and that this court may modify this decision, which has been responsible for the alarming spread of the "yellow-dog" contracts. The New York Court of Appeals recently held such contracts to be invalid because they lack mutuality. Exchange Bakery & Restaurant (Inc.) v. Riffkin (157 N. E. 130) and Interborough Rapid Transit Co. v. Lavin, decided January 10, 1928, and the Ohio Supreme Court, in La France, and so forth, Co. v. Electrical Workers (140 N. E. 809), and the United States Circuit Court of Appeals of the Sixth Circuit, in Bittner v. West Virginia-Pennsylvania Coal Co. (15 F. (2d) 652), have construed the Hitchman Coal & Coke Co. decision so narrowly as to take most of the poison out of it.

I think if we shall pass this bill making such contracts unenforceable by injunctive process, all the poison will have been taken out of the Hitchman case.

Mr. President, at this point I want to call attention to the fact that we do not propose by this bill to make void "yellow-dog" contracts. We do not undertake to make invalid such contracts. As I view it, the employer will have all the common-law remedy now existing respecting such contracts as he has with respect to any other contracts, but the employer will not be permitted to enforce the "yellow-dog" contract by injunctive processes. That is what is proposed to be done by this bill, in my opinion.

Mr. HEBERT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. BLAINE. I yield.

Mr. HEBERT. I am quite in accord with the expression of the Senator so far as injunctive relief under these contracts is concerned. The substitute bill which I prepared provides just that; but the bill now before the Senate provides more than that. I assume the Senator has overlooked the provisions of section 3 which, referring to these contracts, provides that they—shall not be enforceable in any court of the United States and shall not afford any basis for the granting of legal or equitable relief—

The danger to my mind is in the provision regarding legal relief. I myself think that we can limit the power of the courts of the United States so far as injunctive processes are concerned, but I doubt very much if we can outlaw a form of contract which in numerous instances has been declared legal and in accordance with the provisions of the fundamental law. This bill goes farther than the Senator appears to think it goes.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Wisconsin permit me to make an observation there?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. BLAINE. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator from Rhode Island has not read it all. The bill likewise provides, after setting forth in section 2 the public policy of the United States, that these kind of contracts are declared to be contrary to such public policy. That is in the bill, too.

Mr. HEBERT. That is true, Mr. President.

Mr. NORRIS. In another part of the bill it is provided that no injunction shall be issued contrary to the public policy thus set forth. Incidentally it ought to be said, I think, in all fairness, that in every one of the cases where a "yellow-dog" contract was upheld there was no law on the statute books limiting the jurisdiction of the Federal courts as this bill will limit it in that kind of cases. As to the Federal courts below the Supreme Court—and I am speaking of them—we can not only limit their jurisdiction in equity cases, but we can limit their jurisdiction in law cases as well. They have no jurisdiction except what is given to them by the laws of Congress.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, let me suggest at this point that there is some difference of opinion respecting the question of making a contract invalid under all circumstances and of making a contract unenforceable under certain circumstances. I was discussing the proposition that the bill proposes to make the "yellow-dog" contract unenforceable by any injunctive process. I do not care at this time to enter upon the other question, because I think it may confuse the issue. I am perfectly frank in making that suggestion.

Mr. HEBERT. Mr. President, knowing as I did that the Senator did not want to misstate the provisions of the bill, I felt I ought to call his attention to the provision to which I have referred.

Mr. BLAINE. I thank the Senator. I was speaking of my conception of what may be legally done respecting the injunctive process notwithstanding the decision in the Hitchman Coal & Coke Co. case.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. BLAINE. I yield.

Mr. WAGNER. I was going to suggest that I have a perfect right, without violating any law, to make an agreement with a minor, but I can not enforce it. There is the distinction. It is not an illegal contract, but it is unenforceable.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, I want to avoid entering upon a discussion of the police power of the States. I am afraid that if I were to undertake such a discussion at this time I would at once find myself in a position where I must recognize that there is certain power reserved to the States respecting public policy under the police power, but I do not think that question is here involved. I do not want now to discuss that question. I prefer to adhere to that which is the broad purpose of this bill, to prevent under injunctive proceedings the abuses which have been outlined in the debate up to this point.

The whole purpose of my discussion is intended to go to the proposition that under our form of government we ought to operate as a government by law through the executive, legislative, and judicial departments, instead of undertaking to function as a government in relation to law and order and the settlement of disputes between citizens of the country, by way of harsh and unconscionable methods which have been resorted to through injunctive processes. I want it understood that to that extent I am discussing this bill, and I do not want to engage in a debate respecting the reserved powers of the several States to determine what their public policy shall be. In my opinion, the Government of the United States can say what its public policy shall be with respect to conferring power and jurisdiction upon equity courts.

INJUNCTIONS AGAINST STRIKES

Proceeding, Mr. President, to section 4, it provides among other things that the Federal courts are prohibited from issuing any injunctions enjoining workmen from striking, or from making their strike effective by peaceful means. They are also prohibited from issuing injunctions to prevent labor unions from supporting and assisting their members on strike, as has often been done in Federal injunctions in recent years.

I desire to quote from a memorandum—I do not know whether the committee has had access to this memorandum or not—prepared by Dr. Edward E. Witte, of my State, an authority upon all labor questions, and one of the men who very generously gave their time and great ability to the committee in drafting this measure; a man who speaks coolly, has a judicial mind, is calm, and when he discusses a subject does it dispassionately.

In this memorandum he states, referring to section 4:

> This section does not legalize strikes under any and all circumstances. It does not provide that the acts enumerated are always lawful but only that these acts shall not be prohibited by injunction; nor does it even prohibit injunctions against every sort of a strike. On the contrary, this section applies only to disputes involving the same industry, trade, craft, or occupation, or the same employer, or the same union, and only to persons participating and interested in such disputes. This is, thus, a limitation upon the use of injunctions in labor cases to prevent such orders from being used to prohibit or cripple strikes in cases in which there is a bona fide dispute in which the participants have an economic interest, direct or indirect.

If this is thought too broad, it need only be recalled that the corresponding clauses in the Clayton Act have no such limitations, and yet the Supreme Court has never held these clauses to be unconstitutional.

SECTION 5—CONSPIRACIES

Section 5 deals with the question of conspiracy. It has become almost the universal practice for complainants in labor disputes to allege a conspiracy, a combination, a blanket conspiracy and combination, an indefinite thing—allegations lacking specifications but intended to bring into the case every possible suggestion or move made by every single person, singly or collectively, in any labor dispute. The purpose of section 5 is to carry out a common-sense view. If a thing done by an individual is lawful, how can you make out of that thing something vicious or criminal when two or more persons do the same thing?

Mr. President, discussing sections 4 and 5 together, I desire to call attention to the fact that no decision of the United States Supreme Court has ever asserted that workingmen may be enjoined from quitting work. That would amount to involuntary servitude, and only in comparatively rare cases have even the most extreme of injunction judges gone that far. It has become customary, however, to enjoin labor unions and labor-union officials from calling strikes, from paying strike benefits, and from assisting the strikers in any manner.

There are a considerable number of cases, however, in which courts have recognized that such prohibitions against unions and union officials really amount to a denial of the right of the workmen to strike, an indirect but none the less effective method of preventing them from quitting work. (Thomas v. Cincinnati R. R. Co., 62 Fed. 803 at 817; Wabash R. R. Co. v. Hannahan, 121 Fed. 563; Delaware, Lackawanna & Western R. R. Co. v. Switchmen's Union, 156 Fed. 54; Barnes v. Berry, 157 Fed. 883; Kemp v. Street Railway Employees, 99 N. E. 389.) It is this view which has been adopted by the committee in sections 4 and 5. The right to strike is a necessary concomitant of the full freedom of association, self-organization, and designation of representatives of their own choice, which is declared in section 2 to be the public policy of the United States. The right to quit work, if it is to be more than a mere paper right, in turn carries with it the right to ask and receive the advice of union officers, to receive strike benefits accumulated for this very purpose, to advise others of the facts involved in the dispute, and everything else which sections 4 and 5 provide shall not be prohibited in any injunction involving or growing out of a labor dispute issued by any Federal court.

Section 6 is to extend the sound law of agency which prevails in all other business transactions to the officers, the members, the agents of organized labor.

In addition to these provisions relating to the content of injunctions this bill in section 7 sets forth the procedure to be followed in labor-injunction cases. These provisions are designed to reach the abuses which have grown up in the issuance of injunctions. I will not recite these procedural changes in detail but will only call attention to a few of them.

This bill will curb the issuance of injunctions without notice. It does not altogether prohibit the issuance of injunctions in labor disputes without notice to the adverse party, but it does provide that such temporary restraining orders shall be issued only in great emergencies and upon proof which, if sustained upon a hearing, would be sufficient to warrant the issuance of an injunction. It further provides that all restraining orders shall be void after five days, instead of merely providing, as does the present law, that they shall be returnable in 10 days and may be renewed.

As I recall, that is the provision of the Clayton Act. Finally, before such an order may be issued the complainants must furnish a bond sufficient to indemnify the defendants against any loss and expense, including their costs and attorney's fees, resulting from the issuance of the temporary restraining order if it is not sustained after a hearing.

Yet more important are the provisions relating to the proof upon which injunctions and restraining orders may be issued. Before any such order can be issued the court must find that unlawful acts have been committed by the defendants and are likely to be continued; that substantial and irreparable injury to the complainant's property will result therefrom; that as to each item of relief sought greater injury will result to the complainant if relief is not granted than will be caused to the defendants by the denial of such relief; that there is no adequate remedy at law; and that the public officers charged with the duty of protecting the property are unable or unwilling to do so. It is further provided that no injunction is to be issued to any employer who has failed to live up to all requirements imposed upon him by law with reference to such dispute, or who has failed to make every reasonable effort to settle the same.

That provision is contained in section 8. Section 8 does nothing more than to give life and potency to the ancient maxim—as ancient as is the origin of equity—that "He who seeks equity must do equity." He must come into court with clean hands. That principle has been laid down as a sound principle to be observed in labor injunction cases by the supreme court of my State.

Mr. President, the court must not only be satisfied on all of these points, but it must make and enter findings of fact to this effect. This will eliminate injunctions without anything to show why they were issued and will make it possible to get redress upon appeal, if the trial court errs as to the law or the facts. To the same end it is provided that the record in any labor-injunction case shall forthwith be certified to the circuit court of appeals, upon the request of either party, and shall have preference over all other cases in the circuit court of appeals except older causes of the same kind.

The last two provisions are found in sections 9 and 10.

Then there are provisions to insure a real hearing and to place the court in possession of all the facts. It is required that notice of the application for an injunction be personally served upon the known defendants and not upon attorneys assumed to represent them, or by telephone. Likewise, notice must be given the police authorities, so that the court can examine them as to the need for an injunction and the reasons why they are unable to furnish protection to the property. Then it is provided that before an injunction may be issued the witnesses must be examined in open court, with opportunity for cross-examination, to eliminate the great evil of injunctions issued upon affidavits, often made by professional affidavit makers.

JURY TRIAL

I shall now discuss the bill without the suggested amendment to strike out the words "indirect criminal," as I choose to follow the original bill on that proposition, at least presently. I may change my opinion about it before the debate closes. Anyway, eliminating that question, this bill accords the right of trial by jury to all persons charged with indirect criminal contempt, not only in cases growing out of labor disputes but also in all other injunction cases. This is a most valuable check upon the abuse of injunctions, as all who are fighting any attempt to limit injunctions in labor cases have recognized by opposing jury trial for contempt. The right of trial by jury is guaranteed by the Constitution to all persons accused of crime. A criminal contempt is a crime as truly as any other crime and was formerly, and for that matter still is in England, indictable as any other offense and tried in the same manner. The United States Supreme Court has held constitutional the provisions of the Clayton Act which give a right of trial by jury to persons charged with contempt, if the acts upon which this charge is premised also constitute another crime. In view of these decisions I have no doubt that the court will sustain jury trial in all cases of indirect criminal contempt, and this is what is provided for in section 11 of this bill.

GENERAL EFFECT OF THE BILL

Mr. President, in closing I want to make some general observations. I know that there are doubtless some labor people who are a little disappointed in this bill. Doubtless there are some labor people who entertain considerable disappointment. Some would like to have a bill under which no more injunctions could be issued in labor disputes.

The trouble with any bill that could be drawn along these lines is that it would be construed to have no effect whatsoever. The injunction question is far too complicated to be solved by any simple formula. In many respects this bill, particularly in its provisions affecting substantive law, is not as broad as were the labor provisions of the Clayton Act. Unlike that act, however, the provisions of this bill are specific and not capable of several different interpretations. This bill can not be construed, as was the Clayton Act, to make no change in the law. The courts will either have to give effect to the several provisions in this bill or hold them unconstitutional. This alone is worth a great deal more than any number of nice rhetorical phrases, which have no certain meaning and which can be interpreted as being merely a statement of the common law as construed by the courts. This bill, moreover, is not only definite but goes as far as Congress can constitutionally go in this matter. Anything beyond these provisions would probably be held unconstitutional, while everything in this bill, in my opinion, will be sustained.

Nor can there be any doubt that if this bill becomes law and is sustained it will effectively check the abuses that have grown up in the issuance of injunctions in labor disputes by the Federal courts. The procedural changes proposed alone will make resort to injunctions in labor disputes infrequent and will render certain that the working people will have a fair deal in the courts. This is why this bill is being bitterly attacked by the League for Industrial Rights, the National Manufacturers' Association, and similar organizations. This bill is not only a sincere attempt to prevent the abuse of injunctions in labor disputes and to solve the injunction question but is the most promising attack that has ever been made upon this problem, which has agitated the country for more than 30 years and was never more acute than at present.

Mr. HEBERT. Mr. President, I was requested to announce that the senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. WATERMAN], who is absent from the Senate on account of illness, would have subscribed to the minority report which has been filed on Senate bill 935, the so-called anti-injunction bill, which has been the subject of discussion by the Senator from Wisconsin this afternoon.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit, my recollection is that, at least, as far as the majority report was concerned, it was generally understood, in fact, well known in the committee, that the Senator from Colorado was against that. Nobody, therefore, had classified him as being in favor of the majority report. It has always been conceded that he was opposed to that, at least.

Mr. HEBERT. Mr. President, I did not take upon myself the making of this statement, although I knew the attitude of the Senator from Colorado. I made the statement at his request.

DISTRIBUTION OF GOVERNMENT-OWNED WHEAT

Mr. NORBECK. Mr. President, from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, I report favorably Senate Joint Resolution 110, authorizing the distribution of Government-owned wheat by the American National Red Cross and other organizations for relief of distress, and I submit a report (No. 304) thereon.

I ask for the immediate consideration of the joint resolution.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, is this in addition to the amount carried in the joint resolution heretofore passed by the Senate?

Mr. NORBECK. No; the joint resolution heretofore passed failed to get favorable action in the House. The Senate passed a measure carrying 50,000,000 bushels. This one carries only 5,000,000.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the joint resolution was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Federal Farm Board is authorized and directed to take such action as may be necessary to make immediately available 5,000,000 bushels of the wheat of the Grain Stabilization Corporation, or so much thereof as in the judgment of the President may be needed, for the use of the American National Red Cross, or such person or persons as he may designate to pass upon the matter, may deem advisable, in providing for food for the needy and distressed people, and for feed for livestock; available in those areas that suffered from crop failure in 1931. In the delivery of such wheat or any part thereof to any organization or organizations as provided herein, the Federal Farm Board shall be at no expense, and all expense incident to the receipt or distribution of such wheat shall be borne by the organization or organizations to which said wheat is delivered.

SEC. 2. The Federal Farm Board shall keep account of all wheat furnished and delivered as provided herein and shall keep a record of the market price of the wheat so delivered and of the dates of such delivery and may receive a credit therefor against its revolving fund.

Mr. NORBECK. Mr. President, I ask permission to have printed in the RECORD a number of telegrams in support of the joint resolution just passed.

There being no objection, the telegrams were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PIERRE, S. DAK., February 20, 1932.

Senator PETER NORBECK,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

The farmers of this State are in desperate plight because of grasshopper and drought damage as well as the rigorous winter. The feed supply will need to be augmented for those farmers that are unable to secure feed loans. From two to five million bushels of Farm Board wheat could be used to meet the needs of these unfortunate farmers. This grain should be at the disposal of the Red Cross organization, from whose headquarters I have just returned. They are desperately trying to meet the needs of the State and have spent thousands of dollars already for livestock feed.

WARREN GREEN, Governor.

PIERRE, S. DAK., February 18, 1932.

Hon. PETER NORBECK,
United States Senator, Washington, D. C.:

Will you ask Congress to authorize Farm Board to donate Farm Board wheat to feed starving livestock this State? Estimate it will need 200,000 bushels per week for next 10 weeks or approximately 2,000,000 bushels. We have approximately 2,000,000 head cattle, horses, and mules in this State. Estimate that this would only provide two bushels per head, balance of winter for one-half livestock in State. Believe this estimate of number of livestock in dire need of this feed conservative.

L. G. TROTH,
State Secretary of Agriculture.

MITCHELL, S. DAK., February 20, 1932.

Hon. PETER NORBECK,
United States Senator:

Will appreciate your calling conference of South Dakota congressional delegation. Loss of livestock increasing each day. Snow can not possibly disappear under best conditions for three weeks. If all of the feed shipped into the State from relief funds from all sources could be segregated to the two smallest counties in the State it would not be sufficient to carry those counties to May 1. Multiply the amount we have already received twenty-five times, and unless a large portion of that is received within 10 days the loss of livestock will be appalling. This State had approximately two and a half million cattle and horses, to say nothing of hogs and sheep. Under the best conditions and prompt action from every source we lose 25 per cent. Our fund has provided approximately 500 cars en route for destination. We are at a point where we must absolutely demand from some source—State farm board or Government and Farm Board probably only source that could give quick service—2,000,000 bushels grain within three weeks. We are beyond the point of pleading and do demand prompt action.

D. B. GURNEY.

HURON, S. DAK., February 20, 1932.

Senator PETER NORBECK,
Senate Office Building:

If possible Congress should authorize release two and one-half million bushels of Farm Board wheat for feed purposes South Dakota. This estimate represents conclusions of surveys made of requirements for 60 days. This amount needed in addition to feed donated and purchased. Severe winter weather has increased needs enormously and many new applications are received daily.

STATE CHAMBER OF COMMERCE.

YANKTON, S. DAK., February 20, 1932.

Senator PETER NORBECK:

Answer your wire, human needs being met by expenditures already exceeding $200,000. Red Cross will continue discharge this responsibility. Livestock emergency became desperate in group counties contiguous Missouri River 30 days ago. Red Cross spent from national funds over $41,000 for stock feed and has distributed 207 cars donated livestock feed. Between 50 and 60 cars are now rolling. Additional 200 cars being purchased from feed-relief contributions to-day. Appeals in progress may bring three or four hundred additional cars. Red Cross has accepted responsibility of distributing feed made available, but does not assume responsibility for adequate relief stock-feed situation, because problems involve too many interests. Basis of distribution: Small farmers, 6 horses, 6 cows, 10 swine, or less. Minimum number needing relief, 10,000 farmers—some estimates as high as 15,000. Prolonged storms have intensified situation. Important that stock be built up for late spring hazards. Believe relief in sight should be supplemented by 50 to 100 bushels of donated grain per farmer.

ALBERT EVANS.

(Mr. Evans is at head of South Dakota division of American Red Cross.)

HURON, S. DAK., February 20, 1932.

Senator PETER NORBECK:

Relief situation, as regards feeding livestock, would be greatly improved in this State if Congress would release as donation at least 1,000 carloads of Farm Board wheat—half of which should be on way with all possible speed. Indications that situation, as regards free relief for feeding animals, not good. Thousands of farmers doling out hay and grain very sparingly in order to get through winter and early spring the best way they can, which means that many colts, calves, and pigs will be born from animals with weakened strength and which undoubtedly will result in very heavy mortality. Survey among bankers in 48 counties in feed-loan area showed their estimate that 3,547 carloads of corn, 907 carloads small grain, and 12,900 carloads of hay would have to be shipped in to carry their livestock through winter and early spring. Even if these figures are 50 per cent inaccurate the amount would still be large. These estimates were totals, including both grains and hay to be purchased and also to be donated. Our personal desire would be to minimize such statements as far as possible, but conditions are such that we must give you the facts as above.

GEORGE A. STARRING,
Executive Manager South Dakota Bankers' Association.

HURON, S. DAK., February 20, 1932.

Senator PETER NORBECK:

Supplementing my wire this morning, we have just received telegram from a representative banker in each of the following counties estimating amount of feed grains necessary to be donated farmers their counties for livestock, as follows, in bushels: Butte, 7,500; Hand, 20,000; Beadle, 50,000; Potter, 15,000; Brule, 23,000; Hutchinson, 30,000; Lyman, 35,000; Tripp, 50,000; Davison, 8,000. The average of these counties, applied to total distressed area this State, more than totals estimated need my previous telegram. There are counties in worse condition.

GEO. A. STARRING,
Executive Manager South Dakota Bankers' Association.

HURON, S. DAK., February 20, 1932.

Hon. PETER NORBECK,
United States Senate:

Imperative immediate relief be forthcoming for livestock. Farmers unable to qualify for feed loans needed donated feed. Spring crop, calves, pigs, and sheep in grave danger, due lack proper feed and weakened condition breeding stock. Urge Farm Board donate at least million bushels wheat or other feed held by it for distribution by Red Cross.

SOUTH DAKOTA FARM BUREAU FEDERATION.

HURON, S. DAK., February 20, 1932.

Hon. PETER NORBECK, Senator:

Survey made by retailers of South Dakota shows that immediate relief is needed to save livestock. Please urge that Congress immediately release million and a half bushels of wheat, delivery to start at once.

ABERDEEN, S. DAK., February 20, 1932.

DAKOTA FARMER.

HURON, S. DAK., February 20, 1932.

Senator PETER NORBECK:

We indorse requests that have been sent to you from other sources that Congress authorize donation of Farm Board wheat for livestock owned by farmers without credit facilities of any kind.

PAUL K. MEYERS,

WESSINGTON SPRINGS, S. DAK., February 20, 1932.

Senator PETER NORBECK,

Jerauld County will have to have at least 50,000 bushels donated grain to get livestock through to grass. This is in addition to Federal feed loan assistance. Red Cross caring for all human needs. Only one car donated feed received in this county to date. Feed situation growing very serious. Must have assistance right soon. Urge Congress to use surplus grain to help.

CORSICA, S. DAK., February 20, 1932.

Hon. PETER NORBECK,

Home from Sioux Falls Press meeting. Every estimate to date of feed or seed or other aid has proven too low. Five million bushels of Farm Board wheat badly needed. Whole State pinning their faith on your efforts. The human needs are being met, but the foundation stock must be saved for the farmers, so they can carry on. The urgency of immediate action can not be overemphasized.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. McNARY. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES REFERRED

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FESS in the chair) laid before the Senate several messages from the President of the United States submitting nominations, which were referred to the appropriate committees.

(For nominations this day received, see the end of Senate proceedings.)

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 24, 1932

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Bow down Thine ear, O Lord, for we are poor and needy. Inspire us with a serene faith that crowns the soul with rest. O God, graciously regard our country, and may all our citizens be trained in the fundamental moralities of the family, the community, the school, and the state. May they have in them the love of purity, of truth, of honor, and of Christian courtesy. Gracious God, may this Congress receive the blessing of Thy daily guidance. Bless it with wisdom in activity, with understanding in aggression, and with assurance in duty. Give it that tranquillity of mind that holds fear in abatement and lends to courage calmness and strength. Quicken the public conscience and make men know that the glory of a nation lies in its high moral tone. Through Christ our Savior. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate by Mr. Craven, its principal clerk, announced that the Senate had passed a bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House is requested:

S. 3706. An act for the temporary relief of water users on irrigation projects constructed and operated under the reclamation law.

COMMITTEE ON ECONOMY

The SPEAKER. Under House Resolution 151, the Chair appoints as the Economy Committee the following: Mr. BYRNS, Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri, Mr. MCDUFFIE, Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona, Mr. WOOD of Indiana, Mr. WILLIAMSON, and Mr. RAMSEYER.

CORRECTION

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I desire to correct the RECORD. In the discussion yesterday on the bill making appropriations for the Departments of State, Justice, Commerce, and Labor the RECORD carries some language attributed to me which has been called to my attention as offending one Member of this House. In my service of five terms in this House it has never been my purpose, and never will be, to offend any man or woman in this body. For all of them I entertain the greatest respect and esteem. It would hurt me more than it would them if I were aware that anyone here felt I had offended him.

In discussing the appropriation bill I was informed—and I understand my information is correct—that only one member of the subcommittee voted to reduce the appropriation for the enforcement of prohibition, and in that connection I am recorded as having used the language which I desire to withdraw from the RECORD, because it has offended one member of the subcommittee whose friendship I cherish.

Mr. Speaker, I therefore ask unanimous consent to withdraw that language, so that it will not appear in the permanent bound RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

Mr. BLANTON. I reserve the right to object. Merely for the purpose of keeping the RECORD straight, I want to ask the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OLIVER], who was the chairman of the committee that framed this bill, if it is not a fact that not a McBride, not a Cannon, and not anyone connected with the Anti-Saloon League or any other temperance cause ever appeared before our committee, and not one wrote us a letter?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. That is correct; and let me say that the action of the gentleman from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR] is entirely in keeping with what I felt he would do when this was called to his attention. He assured me he did not intend it in an offensive way and would be very glad to withdraw it from the RECORD. [Applause.]

LEAVE FOR JUDICIARY COMMITTEE TO SIT DURING THE SESSIONS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on the Judiciary may be privileged to sit during the sessions of the House for the remainder of the week.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

CHICAGO POST OFFICE—SUBSTITUTE CLERKS

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD on substitute clerks in the Chicago post office.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD I deem it of sufficient importance to present, in the most simple picture possible, a very serious and deplorable condition existing in the Chicago post office relative to substitute clerks. Undoubtedly some of the Members of this House are confronted with similar conditions in the post offices throughout their congressional districts.

In Chicago there are 442 substitute clerks on the rolls of the post office. Recently 97 substitute clerks were told not to report for work again until notified. Their admission cards were taken up, so to all intents and purposes they have been discharged. Their names are on the rolls, but not the pay rolls.

Approximately 350 substitute clerks report for duty at some time during the week. They usually report about two days each week and are allowed to work from two to three hours when so reporting. They are thus enabled to average about six hours of work each week for which they receive the sum of 65 cents per hour. The average earnings are therefore slightly less than $4 per week.

Substitute clerks are theoretically, at least, employees of the Post Office Department, and because of this they are denied relief at any of the organized relief agencies. The fund established within the Postal Service to aid substitute employees is now sadly depleted and must in the near future become completely exhausted.

The fact that the volume of mail has declined is generally given as the reason for this condition. The month of January, 1932, shows a decline of 12 per cent in first-class mail and 13 per cent in third-class or circular mail, over the same period in 1931. This condition is, of course, of some importance, though not as great as one might imagine. This decline is not felt at only one hour of the day but throughout the entire working service, so that the decline per hour is trivial.

The greatest single factor in this situation, is the fact that the schedules of regular clerks have been so changed about that they cover all of the peak periods. The peak period in the Chicago office is from 4 to 8.30 p. m. One hundred and seventy-five men who formerly reported for duty at 8 a. m. now report at 11.15 a. m. and work until 8.15 p. m. Approximately 160 other men, who formerly reported for duty at 1.30 p. m. and worked to 10.30 p. m. now report at 4 p. m. and work until 1 a. m. These are all older men, some of them with periods of service ranging up to 30 years. Those employes who formerly reported at 4 p. m. are also required to report at slightly later periods, but are perhaps the least affected by this change.

In the past substitutes were allowed to work on Saturdays to clean up work left at the conclusion of the 4-hour schedule of regular employees. Due to the fact that regular clerks are now required to work five and six hours on Saturday, this opportunity for the substitutes to work has been almost eliminated. Regular employees thus compelled to work more than four hours on Saturday are given the necessary compensatory time off during the following week, at a time designated by the supervisors, and usually at a time least desirable to the employees. Formerly clerks employed in the mailing division were not required to work on Sunday except in special cases. Very nearly all Sunday work was done by substitutes. Now regular clerks are required to report Sunday evening and work anywhere from two to three and a half hours, for which they are allowed time off during the following week, usually at a time least desirable to the men involved. When this occasion happens it has the effect of depriving regular employees of a complete day with their families at any time during the week. While this may, perhaps, not be a violation of existing law, it does prevent the result which the law sought to accomplish from becoming a reality.

There have been no appointments to the regular clerk grade since April, 1930. Thus, the minimum time that a substitute could have served is slightly under 23 months, while the highest men on the list have served as substitutes anywhere from 2½ to 4 years.

I have given considerable thought to methods by which the 44-hour-week law might be amended to make it more effective, and have reached the conclusion that the bill H. R. 7624, introduced by Mr. MEAD, of New York, providing a 5-day week, if enacted, would solve the problem. Unless such a bill is passed, some provision should be made to guarantee these faithful postal employees a sufficient income to enable them to live and to support their families while they are awaiting a regular appointment. The slight of our postal substitutes is a pathetic one and should be corrected without delay. I express the hope the Mead measure, or a similar one, will receive the consideration of this House in the very near future, and that same will be acted upon favorably by its membership.

ADDRESS OF HON. EWIN L. DAVIS

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by incorporating a speech made by the gentleman from Tennessee, Judge DAVIS, before the Fifth National Merchant Marine Conference.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

There was no objection.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted, I insert the following address delivered by Hon. EWIN L. DAVIS, Chairman of the Committee on Merchant Marine, Radio, and Fisheries, before the Fifth National Merchant Marine Conference, Washington, D. C., January 27, 1932. Legislative Needs of American Shipping:

SHALL WE AMERICANIZE OR ALIENIZE OUR MERCHANT MARINE?

Mr. Chairman, ladies, and gentlemen, I am very glad to greet you on this occasion. I wish that I had the time to attend all of your sessions and listen to all of the discussions. I am sure that I shall later have an opportunity of seeing your proceedings in print.

However, I had to steal away from a large amount of work in order to be with you a few moments, and I have had absolutely no time even to consider what I wished to say to you. I am very much in the attitude of the old negro preacher down in my State who had made quite a reputation as an evangelist. There was a white minister in the same town who met the old colored parson on the street one day and stopped him and said, "Parson, I hear a great deal of the wonderful success you have had among your people. I understand that you have been very successful in your evangelistic work and have won hundreds and hundreds of the souls of your people to Christ. As you know, I have been a minister in a certain white church here for several years, and have worked laboriously and given my best efforts to the work; I have prepared and delivered the best sermons of which I was capable, and while my congregation always listens very courteously, yet for some reason I do not seem to touch their hearts, and I have had very few converts in my church during my several years as minister here, and I should like for you to explain to me your method and the reasons for your success." The old darky preacher said, "Well, Mr. Brown, I 'spect you writes and memorizes yo' sermons, don't you?" Mr. Brown said, "Oh, yes; I always write and rewrite and polish my sermons, because I would not think about preaching to my very learned congregation without putting my very best efforts into the work." The old darkey said, "Well, Mr. Brown, that is just you' trouble, I think. Don't you know when you are writing and rewriting and memorizing you' sermon the old devil is looking right over you' shoulder, and he sees everything you are going to say, and he steels the hearts of the congregation against everything you are going to say before you say it. Now, Mr. Brown, that's not my method. I never wrote a sermon in my life. When the Sabbath day comes I goes to the Lord's house, walks down the aisle to the pulpit, and opens the Good Book, and wherever it happens to open and the first verse my eyes falls upon I takes as my text, and neither me nor the devil knows what I'm going to say." [Laughter.]

However, I wish to state that I am very much interested in the subject of an American merchant marine. For 12 years I have been a member of the committee of the House of Representatives which has jurisdiction over legislation relating to that subject. While I am from an inferior State, a landlubber, so to speak, and was placed upon that committee without solicitation and without my previous knowledge, I became interested in the subject and have applied to a study of that subject my very best efforts. The fact that I was far removed from the seaports in a way, perhaps, has been an advantage because I have certainly been unhampered and unembarrassed by any local or constituent interest that might otherwise have endeavored, as is natural, to influence my thought and effort.

I am, and have always been—and I presume it is unnecessary for me to state that to you gentlemen—a friend of the American merchant marine. I think that it is vitally important that this great country of ours shall have an American merchant marine to carry a large portion of our commerce in times of peace and to serve us in case of a national emergency; and even from the standpoint of national defense, as I have often said, I consider that the merchant marine is equally as important as the Navy, and certainly proved to be more so in the last war. [Applause.]

That is a fact I think which is too often overlooked when those who are criticizing the policies with respect to an American merchant marine count the cost. If they would compare the cost with the cost of the maintenance of our Navy, it would be perhaps more enlightening.

However, while I am in favor of an American merchant marine, I am in favor of an American merchant marine just as the words imply. I am not in favor of any hybrid or foreign-affiliated interest. I am in favor of a 100 per cent American merchant marine and so long as I may be a Member of Congress, and so long as I may be a member of the Committee on Merchant Marine, Radio, and Fisheries, I am going to bend every effort to that end. [Applause.] I shall do that without any feeling or malice, but as an American citizen and because I am interested in preserving and maintaining an American merchant marine, and you can not do it any other way.

In this connection I want to state that I shall shortly—and I see from the program I am expected to talk to you upon legislative needs—I shall shortly introduce one or more bills embracing several different amendments and subjects relating to our merchant marine, and I think that they are all constructive, and in the interest and for the protection of the American merchant marine, as well as the American public.

In the first place, I intend to introduce one or more bills designed to preserve absolute our coastwise trade. I think that these so-called trips of alien ships from our ports to nowhere are at least a violation in spirit of our coastwise laws, and I intend to offer a bill to rectify that situation.

I also think that at least the spirit, if not the letter, of our coastwise law is being violated by certain foreign-flag ships engaging at least in part in coastwise service, and I intend to introduce a bill to rectify that situation and to prevent those practices.

I think that I shall also introduce a bill much akin to that, although with some changes, introduced by Mr. WHITE in the last Congress, clarifying and amplifying the section of the merchant marine act defining a "fighting ship." I want to treat other nations fairly, but our first duty and first responsibility are to our own, and in this connection I want to state that in my opinion and upon my information we are infinitely more generous to alien-flag ships in giving them our mail—on the pound basis, of course—than the foreign governments are in giving it to our ships. The practice in this country is that if the giving of it to an alien-flag ship will expedite its delivery more than 24 hours, it shall be done. It would be all right for that to be done if we received reciprocal treatment. But as we do not receive reciprocal treatment from other countries, according to my information, I do not think it is incumbent upon us to do it. I would like to see them accorded the same treatment in that respect that they accord our ships.

I wish also to state that I shall shortly reintroduce my bill which was unanimously reported by the committee in the last Congress and which unanimously passed the House in the last Congress and died in the Senate committee, providing in substance that hereafter ocean mail contracts shall not be awarded to any company which directly or indirectly operates or controls the operation of foreign-flag ships in competition with American-flag ships. [Applause.] If there is any man present who does not consider that sound and an American policy, I hope he will stand up. [No one arose.] During all the hearings before the committee, before and during all of the discussion, I never at any time heard but one man who was bold enough to say that that proposal was unsound in principle.

As was stated by the preceding speaker, and as is so often stated, what we have in mind with respect to an American merchant marine is a merchant marine whose ships are built by American labor, manned by American seamen, owned by American citizens, and operated under the American flag. [Applause.] And whenever you leave any of those elements out to that extent you impair the fact that it is an American merchant marine. All of those are essential, and I want to say to you that we will never build up or maintain an American merchant marine otherwise, and I want to say, furthermore, that the American people and the Congress who represent them will not continue any other course. Just remember that.

Yes; some things have been done under the merchant marine act of 1928 which I do not indorse, and which I believe the American people do not indorse, and which I know the Congress does not indorse. Much good has been done. We have made wonderful strides and up until the commencement of the present slump there was a marvelous progress made in the American merchant marine. Many very useful and beneficial things have been done under the merchant marine act of 1928, but some things have been done which were a violation of the spirit, if not the letter, of the law, and I propose to tighten up the provisions of that law to the end that those mistakes will not be repeated, and one of them is in the manner which I have indicated, and I want to suggest this to all of you engaged in the shipping industry, that if you are interested in the maintenance of the aid which has been provided and in the encouragement which you all feel is necessary, you had better put your shoulders to the wheel and help Americanize, and keep Americanized, the American merchant marine or you will find out sooner or later—and not very late at that—that the entire structure will be torn down. Now remember that. I know something of the temper of the American people on that subject. They are willing to go very far in order to build up and maintain a real American merchant marine, but they are not willing to aid those who are dividing their allegiance between American and alien interests. It is indefensible, un-American, and must be and shall be stopped.

I realize that there are only a few interests that are opposed to that American proposition, but it behooves the rest of you to see that their idea does not prevail if you have at heart the American merchant marine.

Now, another thing: As was stated by the preceding speaker, and as we have all stated time after time and time after time, one of the essentials of an American merchant marine, and one contemplated in the merchant marine act passed in 1928, or as amended in 1928, is that it shall be manned by American seamen. With that thought in view, in section 405, subsection C, of the merchant marine act of 1928, it was provided that all of the licensed officers should be American citizens, and for four years not less than 50 per cent of the crew sailing upon these vessels receiving mail-contract pay should be American citizens, and after the expiration of four years two-thirds. The only discussion and the only controversy over that subject in Congress was the effort of many, including myself, to increase the percentage of American seamen, and when we went into conference with the Senate conferees there was a strong insistence that it be made 75 per cent American from the date of the passage of the bill, but it was finally left like it was. There was not a member of either committee—and I do not believe there was a Member of Congress—who contemplated anything else than that that language meant just what it said and would have the effect contemplated.

However, after the law went into effect it developed that there was an old war emergency measure passed in 1918 along with other war emergency measures, which provided that if an alien made a declaration of his intention to become an American citizen and had served three years on a United States merchant or fishing vessel, he should be deemed an American citizen for the purpose of sailing on a merchant ship. As you know, that was done because of the great scarcity of seamen at that time and it was a war emergency measure. But a certain company, I am advised, invoked this old law, with the result that the Commissioner of Navigation referred this provision in the merchant marine act of 1928, together with this old statute, to the Department of Justice, and they held that because it did not specifically do so, the merchant marine act of 1928 did not repeal that old provision and that it was still in force. And what has been the result? The result has been that that provision of the 1928 law has been absolutely nullified, and I am informed that it has been, and is being, nullified, not only with respect to the crew but with respect to licensed officers on American ships, and it is a common practice—you gentlemen know about this—if an alien wants to sail on an American vessel, he goes to the shipping commissioner or the Sea Service Bureau and if he has not taken out his first papers, he is told to go over to the clerk and make his first declaration and then he comes back and gets fixed up. Oh, such a travesty on the law, and on the idea of an American merchant marine manned by American seamen! Talking about the national defense side, it is obvious we would be in a pretty pickle if we got into another real war and we have to send our merchant marine, transports and supply ships to sea all manned by aliens, because we all know that most of those first papers are taken out merely as a matter of form, and most of the families of the seamen are living abroad, and they are spending their money abroad and most of them never have any intention of becoming American citizens.

I am going to embrace in a bill a provision to make the 1928 act effective, so that it will be construed just as it was meant, and those of you in the industry who are interested in an American merchant marine and who are interested in and want the approval and interest of Congress representing the American people had better not stand in the way of that provision.

Now, gentlemen, you may think that I am talking rather plainly; that is the only way I know how to talk. I do not care who knows how I stand on any subject. I am always perfectly frank with everybody. The only way I know how to talk is to talk straight from the shoulder with anybody I am talking to, and I like for those with whom I am talking to talk to me in the same way.

I understand this is a conference. I am not making a speech, but simply conferring with you gentlemen on a subject in which we are all interested and in which I am just as much interested as anybody, but I am interested solely and exclusively from the standpoint of a legislator and a representative of the American people as a whole, including the American merchant marine.

I have already said more to you than I had intended. I realize that you have all been experiencing very adverse conditions for the past two years. That is true with respect to every line of endeavor and every industry. The situation is deplorable and distressing. As a matter of fact I think that the shipping industry has done pretty well to weather the storm as well as you have up to date, and I sincerely hope that you will all be able to carry on and that you will be able to weather the storm through to the end and be prepared to carry on in a successful and prosperous way when prosperity returns in a manner that will not only bring you just returns but which at the same time will help build up and maintain an American merchant marine of use to the Nation as a whole.

I have never yet, so far as I realize, made a criticism of this subject, or of any official connected with it, which I did not consider to be constructive and in the interest of the upbuilding of the American merchant marine. You know we all have to chastise our own children as much as we love them. It is frequently necessary to do many things that are distasteful, and so it is not pleasant to criticize at all. I am not questioning the motives of any official, or of anybody else for that matter. I am simply discussing plain facts and giving my views with regard to same.

In this connection I wish to state that, as perhaps most of you are aware, the Committee on Merchant Marine, Radio, and Fisheries, even before Christmas, decided to conduct a general inquiry into the entire merchant marine and shipping situation, embracing the Shipping Board operations, the construction loans, and the awarding of mail contracts, etc. That, too, was intended purely and solely as a constructive proposition and not as a muck-raking proposition. I want to say that members of the Shipping Board welcomed that inquiry. We all realize that many things have been said—many criticisms—with regard to things which had been done or alleged to have been done by the Shipping Board and the Postmaster General, and so we all felt that it was proper, that it was best to have a fair, constructive inquiry to develop the facts and to vindicate, if the facts justified it—and if they did not justify it—in order that the committee and the Congress and the public might know the mistakes which had been made, and which might be prevented in the future or otherwise rectified. That is the purpose of that inquiry. While it is not a muck-raking proposition, it is not a whitewashing proposition. We are simply undertaking in a dispassionate way to develop the facts in order that the old members of the committee may know what has transpired since Congress adjourned last March and in order that the new members of the committee may obtain a general picture of the situation of the American merchant marine.

I wish to say in conclusion that I am very happy to have had an opportunity to greet you, and I certainly hope that the time is not far distant—although I do not presume to make any predictions—when conditions will begin to improve, and you can all at least hold on and carry on until a better day, when you will get better returns.

I thank you. [Applause.]

EXPENSES OF GOVERNMENT

Mr. HOLADAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the expenses of Government.

There was no objection.

Mr. HOLADAY. Mr. Speaker, the curtailment of expenses of our National Government is a matter that is claiming the attention of our people.

The Bureau of the Budget, after extended hearings and consultation with all of the various departments, bureaus, and agencies of our National Government, prepares a Budget estimate of the appropriations that, in the opinion of the Budget Bureau, will be necessary for the succeeding year. The Budget estimate is submitted to Congress upon its convening in December of each year, and the estimate is for the fiscal year beginning on the 1st of July, following.

In speaking of the estimates for any particular year, the calendar year in which the fiscal year ends is used. Thus, the Budget estimate submitted to Congress in December, 1931, was for the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1932, and ending June 30, 1933, and is spoken of as the Budget for 1933.

The following table shows the amounts estimated by the Budget Bureau as necessary for the proper operation of the various departments for the fiscal year of 1933. The table also shows the percentage that each item bears to the total amount of all appropriations. Similar percentage information with reference to the amount appropriated for the fiscal year of 1932 and the amount expended in the fiscal year of 1931 is contained in the table.

The average person may be surprised to learn that out of every $100 expended by our Government $71.88 goes to pay the cost of war, past, present, and future. Twenty-eight and eighty-three one-hundredths per cent of our total cost of Government is expended for the retirement and interest charges on our war debt. This item is a fixed charge and can not be reduced. Twenty-six and seventy one-hundredths per cent is expended in the payment of pensions, compensation, and hospital expenses, and this expenditure can not be reduced unless our pension laws are repealed and hospital facilities for ex-service men are withdrawn.

In any attempt to curtail the expenses of our Government we are confronted with the fact that it will be practically impossible to effect any savings in 55.53 per cent of our total expenditure. Sixteen and thirty-five one-hundredths per cent of the total cost is for the maintenance of our Army and Navy, and any attempt to effect a saving in this item immediately evokes loud protests from all military organizations.

The next item is for public improvement, and 9.03 per cent of the proposed total expenditures is allocated to public improvements. The amount appropriated for public improvement can be materially reduced, but such reduction is by many people thought inadvisable, especially in times of business depression such as we are now experiencing. The $356,000,000 proposed to be spent for public improvements will in large part be expended for labor and will enable thousands of men to find employment, where otherwise they might be compelled to join the five to seven million men now out of employment.

The remaining appropriation items amounting to less than 20 per cent of the whole are for all other expenses of the Government and a material reduction in any or all of these items does not make a material reduction in the whole amount.

The Appropriations Committee has to date reported four bills back to the House.

The first deficiency bill, which was the first bill reported by the committee, was reduced 10.48 per cent under the Budget estimate. The Agriculture bill was reduced 5.74 per cent; the Interior bill was reduced 11.06 per cent; and the bill for State, Justice, Commerce, and Labor was reduced 4.14 per cent.

It is the hope of the Appropriations Committee that similar reductions can be made in the balance of the appropriation bills. If the committee is able to protect the bills on the floor of the House and the Senate does not increase the amount carried in the various bills, a material reduction in the costs of government will have been made.

AGRICULTURAL-CREDIT CORPORATION

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I present a conference report upon House Joint Resolution 292, to authorize the Secretary of Agriculture to aid in the establishment of agricultural-credit corporations, and for other purposes, for printing under the rules.

ECONOMY COMMITTEE—H. RES. 151

Mr. DISNEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on House Resolution 151, passed yesterday.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DISNEY. Mr. Speaker, attention has been focused on the matter of excess bureaus, boards, and commissions this week, largely because after certain Senate and House Democrats had introduced resolutions looking to economies in that line the President sent a special message to Congress urging that it appoint a new commission to investigate the old commissions, boards, and bureaus, at a cost of $40,000, with a view to cutting down expenses on the part of the old commissions.

I introduced Concurrent Resolution No. 21 on Tuesday of this week to determine where the Government could economize and retrench by the abolishment of the useless boards and commissions. Governmental expenses in the last 20 years have grown to an alarming extent. Bureaus, boards, commissions, and agencies have grown top-heavy with overlapping functions and duplicated expenses. Duplicated effort has created a labyrinth of red tape that at times is almost insurmountable. It is said that 1 man in every 12 or 15 is governing us. This takes taxes and still more taxes. No wonder the people are complaining about taxes. We are inspected in everything from toenails to toothbrushes, and the furtive eye of some governmental agency is cast upon us in every walk of life.

This is not confined to the Federal Government alone, because the first Oklahoma Legislature appropriated only $3,000,000, the next legislature about five million, the next eight million, the next eleven million, and so on, until the last legislature made appropriations of some $30,000,000.

While I was a member of the legislature in 1923, when the appropriations were all in, I procured the passage of a resolution to cut all appropriations 20 per cent, and it was found that they could be cut, and they were cut to that extent without damage to the service of the State. This can be done in Federal affairs as well as in State affairs.

There is only one large-scale employer in the whole country, as far as I know, that is not engaged in business for profit, and that is the State and Federal Government. Upon its pay roll at the present time are approximately 590,000 employees, and the number of employees has increased 68,000 in 10 years. This is a staggering total for the peace-time operation of the Government. The salaries of these employees, including my own, except those under $2,500, could easily be cut 10 per cent, and if such a bill is brought before the House, I shall vote for it. Throughout the entire history of our Government its business has grown up with little system or plan. As new needs developed departments and bureaus have been added, particularly in the last 10 years. Department heads have set up new activities with duplicated expenses and overlapping functions.

At the expense of burdening you with a vast amount of figures permit me to read you how the cost of Government has increased since 1924. Since 1924 the expense of the Government has increased between $600,000,000 and $1,000,000,000 per year. For instance:

The State Department spent $14,000,000, now it spends $16,000,000.

The Treasury spent $260,000,000, now it spends $310,000,000.

The Department of Justice spent $21,000,000, now $53,000,000.
Commerce spent $21,000,000, now $49,000,000.
Agriculture spent $141,000,000 in 1924 and eight years later spends $330,000,000.
Interior spent $328,000,000 in 1924 and dropped to $78,000,000 in 1932, due to shifting of the pension administration and other departments.
War Department has gone up from $348,000,000 to $483,000,000, and the Navy from $332,000,000 to $378,000,000.
The Board of Tax Appeals will cost us $650,000 for the year 1932 and it was a $350,000 organization.
The Civil Service Commission has gone up from a million to a million and a half.
Employees' Compensation Commission from two and a half million to four and a half million.
The Federal Board for Vocational Education was a five and a half million dollar body, now is a ten million dollar organization.
The Federal Farm Board didn't exist then. Now its current expenses are about one and a half million, which doesn't include advances for price stabilization.
The Federal Power Commission cost us $40,000, now it costs $300,000.
The Federal Radio Commission didn't exist then. Now it is a $400,000 body.
The Interstate Commerce Commission, then spending $5,000,000, now is spending $9,000,000.
The Federal Trade Commission has gone from a million to a million and a half.
The Tariff Commission has gone from $750,000 to a million and a quarter.
Market News Service used to cost $400,000, now it costs $1,400,000.
Plant Industry once cost $2,500,000, now costs $5,500,000.
Forest service has gone up in 7 years from 10 million to 20 million.
In the Department of Commerce, the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce used to spend $2,000,000, now it spends $5,000,000.
In the year 1924 there was no aeronautical branch of the Department of Commerce. There was a National Committee on Aeronautics which spent half a million dollars. The Aeronautical Branch of Commerce now spends ten millions.
The Bureau of Fisheries used to get along with $1,300,000, now it spends nearly $3,000,000.
Immigration which cost four and a half million now costs ten million.
The Women's Bureau went from $100,000 to $150,000.
Employment service was $200,000 and is now nearly $900,000.
Striking increases are found in the Interior Department where the support of Indian schools has gone up from four million to ten million, and the National Park Service from $1,600,000 to $9,000,000.

And so on to the end of a long chapter, making up a total increase of $600,000,000 to $1,000,000,000.

This increasing expense, this back-breaking toll of taxation, charged against the productive forces of America—forces diminished by approximately twenty billions since 1929—is dangerous. We have built up governmental machinery—State, local, and Federal—to a point where it costs you and me $14,000,000,000 a year. You and I, all of us, men and women and children, earned only $70,000,000,000 last year.

One dollar out of five now goes to provide the pay roll of Government, variously estimated, with their dependents, at between eighteen and twenty millions of people. To collect these taxes and to spend the money, we have over 250,000 independent tax-gathering and tax-spending units in the United States to-day.

Such activities can be roughly grouped under three heads: First, in more than 250 undertakings the Federal Government alone is competing with its own citizens, citizens who provide the wherewithal for such competition. From banking, insurance, oil, coal, lumber, agriculture, transportation, manufacturing, such as—to begin the alphabet—the production and sale of agricultural products, aircraft, anchors, awnings, auto license tags, brooms and brushes, and on through, including the operation of hotels and laundries and printing plants and warehousing.

The second group of activities which cost us money are the regulatory and supervisory and the "servicing" jobs which the Government has taken on increasingly in the last few years. Every act of the individual, waking or sleeping, is now regulated by some public authority. Whole sections of our industrial life are now under the deadening influence of political boards which tell individuals how to conduct their business, from agriculture, power and light, and radio to rails and the air. And those industries that are not regulated directly have a sort of supervision from other boards, commissions, and bureaus.

The Government thoughtfully informs us where bed sheets wear out first. It teaches us how to forecast the price of hogs by logarithms. We are taught how to brush our teeth, polish our shoes, and to rear goldfish. We are instructed on pine-needle basketry and how to prepare caviar for the table.

The farmer is told how to farm, the merchant is told how to manage a grocery store, the exporter is told how to pack goods for shipment overseas. We are instructed as to the mating habits of bull frogs, the idiosyncracies of oysters, and as to the operation of the lowly flytrap.

This inquisitorial activity takes form in a myriad of questionnaires and an army of field men studying your activities at first hand.

For years the President and his predecessors, under whom he served as a Cabinet officer, have had the Bureau of the Budget and the Accounting Department at their beck and call to correct these evils by reorganization of the departments and the cutting out of useless expenditures. Even now the administration is using every power under the sun to avoid a consolidation of the War and Navy Departments, which would effect a saving of $100,000,000 a year. With its right hand the administration calls for economy, and with its left hand it opposes this gigantic saving.

The total bonded indebtedness of the whole United States to-day is over $30,000,000,000. States, counties, and municipalities have defaulted in the amount of approximately seven hundred millions in the last year. We had a deficit for 1931 of over $900,000,000, and a deficit for 1932 of over $2,100,000,000, and we are told that we face a deficit of at least one billion two hundred fifty millions, exclusive of debt retirement, for the year 1933. Under President Wilson in 1921 the expense of the White House was $293,680, while for the present year of 1932 they amount to $652,179, an increase of about 125 per cent.

When Mr. Hoover was Secretary of Commerce, the appropriations for that department were $24,000,000 per year. When he left the department in 1929 they had increased practically 66⅔ per cent, to forty millions per year, and for 1932 they amount to fifty-four millions. The Bureau of the Budget, which is at the command of the President, costs us $200,000 per year, and the General Accounting Office, also under control of the President, uses $4,000,000 per year. These two offices have been at the command of the President during the last 10 years, so it is said by many that this sudden rush on the part of the administration to find out what boards and bureaus can be abandoned and abolished is inconsistent, because the General Accounting Office and the Bureau of the Budget could have given the Chief Executive this advice long ago, and the consolidation, abolishment, and curtailment of bureaucratic activities could have been inaugurated many years before the crucial campaign of 1932.

Right now the Ways and Means Committee is attempting to devise plans to balance the Budget and to meet the deficit of over $2,000,000,000. The House Appropriations Committee, headed by JOSEPH W. BYRNS, of Tennessee, has reduced the estimate of the Bureau of the Budget, which is under the President's control, in the deficiency bill more than 10 per cent. It has reduced the Department of Agriculture bill from the Bureau of the Budget estimates between 6 and 7 per cent and has reduced the Interior Department bill from the Government estimates from fifty-six million down to fifty million, or over 10 per cent. Chairman BYRNS made the statement on the floor of the House that all of the Government bills can be reduced at least 5 per cent and in many instances 12 to 15 per cent.

The deficiency bill was pared by the Appropriations Committee $14,780,850.18; the Agricultural bill, $10,799,591; the State-Justice-Commerce bill, $5,382,818.77; the Interior bill, about six millions—a total reduction of the expenditures saved by the conduct of the Appropriations Committee of $37,237,179.95. And greater economies are yet to follow.

These figures have not been pleasant to hear. The remedies evoked must be drastic. These appropriations must be cut from 5 to 15 per cent or our expenditures for this fiscal year will run to $5,000,000,000. These boards and bureaus must be slashed to the limit. Taxpayers are groaning beneath a terrific load of taxation, and, besides that, their homes are being foreclosed, and, what is worse, millions do not know where the next meal is coming from. The last report of the Labor Department states that nearly 12,000,000 people are out of employment. There is no earthly excuse for this governmental extravagance except cowardice on the part of the governing officials who are unable to say "no" when appropriation bills are presented to them.

In the face of the insistent attitude of the administration, and for political purposes of the 1932 campaign, we hear a hue and cry about "reorganizing" the bureaus, commissions, and boards that have grown up, particularly in the last 10 years. The claim is made by the administration for the credit for each syllable of legislation that is calculated to relieve the serious situation that has grown up under its management. The administration can not expect to carry on partisan warfare to promote the prospects of the reelection of their candidate while the Democrats in Congress maintain a political truce in an effort to restore prosperity. Credit must go where credit is due, and partisan claims for credit will not go by unchallenged.

The appointment of the economy committee under Resolution 151 will be a step toward the relief of the people from this growing labyrinth of useless boards, bureaus, and commissions.

CALENDAR-WEDNESDAY BUSINESS

The SPEAKER. This is Calendar Wednesday, and the Clerk will call the committees.

The Clerk called the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

INCREASING PASSPORT FEES

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 9393) to increase passport fees, and for other purposes, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 2 of the act entitled "An act to regulate the issue and validity of passports, and for other purposes," approved July 3, 1926, as amended by the act entitled "An act to provide for the renewal of passports," approved July 1, 1930, is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 2. That the validity of a passport or passport visa shall be limited to a period of two years: Provided, That a passport may be renewed under regulations prescribed by the Secretary of State for a period not to exceed two years, upon payment of a fee of $5 for such renewal, but the final date of expiration shall not be more than four years from the original date of issue: Provided further, That the Secretary of State may limit the validity of a passport, passport visa, or the period of renewal of a passport to less than two years: Provided further, That the charge for the issue of an original passport shall be $9."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maryland calls up the bill H. R. 9393. This bill is on the Union Calendar. The House will automatically resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill, and the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. ROGERS] will please take the chair.

Accordingly, the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 9393, with Mr. ROGERS in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LINTHICUM] is recognized for one hour.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask recognition in opposition, if no member of the committee opposes the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Does any member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs oppose the bill?

Mr. RUDD. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to the bill, and I ask recognition for one hour.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. RUDD] will be recognized for one hour in opposition.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, this is a bill primarily, and perhaps absolutely, for additional revenue for the State Department and the Foreign Service. In 1930 our late distinguished colleague, Mr. O'Connell of New York, introduced a bill which did not change the amount of the passport fee, which was $9, and the application fee, $1, making a total of $10, but which did grant two extensions upon that passport. The Committee on Foreign Affairs considered that bill and agreed to report it with two amendments. One amendment was that the two extensions of the passport should cost $2 each for the two years, and the other amendment provided that teachers' passports should not cost more than $5. The bill was reported to the House, and the House amended the bill, upon motion of the gentleman from Michigan, Mr. Cramton, striking out the teacher provision and inserting in lieu thereof a $5 fee for passports, which carried with it the $5 fee for every passport that was issued, and eliminated the $9 passport. That reduced the revenue more than $1,184,047. Had Mr. O'Connell's bill been passed as it was reported, it would probably not have reduced it more than $400,000 or $500,000. At the present time we are in need of revenue from every source, and particularly in need of revenue for the State Department and for the Foreign Service. Under this bill we renew the $9 fee for the passport and, of course, the $1 for the application, which always prevails, which makes the total $10, instead of the $5 and the $1, or a total of $6. Under the present law we are getting a revenue of $944,023, whereas under the old law we got as high as $2,916,000, and in 1930 we received a revenue of $2,128,000, so that according to the calculations of the State Department under this bill, with one renewal, we would get an additional revenue of about $700,000.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Yes.

Mr. DYER. This is the first bill that has come into the House for consideration at this session which provides for bringing some money into the Treasury in addition to what we have been getting heretofore. Is not that the fact?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Yes. I know of no other bill which has yet come before the House adding revenue.

Mr. DYER. All of the other bills that we have considered up to this time have been taking money out of the Treasury?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Yes.

Mr. DYER. I congratulate the gentleman and his committee.

Mr. LINTHICUM. The Foreign Affairs Committee is the first committee to have considered on the floor a bill to bring in revenue.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. In reply to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DYER], all of those taking-money-out bills came from the White House.

Mr. DYER. That is where they ought to come from.

Mr. BLANTON. The $2,000,000,000 taking-out bill and the $125,000,000 taking-out bill came from the White House.

Mr. LINTHICUM. This bill did not come from the White House; it originated in the Foreign Affairs Committee.

Mr. PURNELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Yes.

Mr. PURNELL. I want to know whether this is a putting-in bill or a taking-out bill. The gentleman states that something like $700,000 will accrue as a result of this bill, as additional revenue?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Yes.

Mr. PURNELL. Will that fund be turned over to the Federal Treasury or it will be returned to the State Department?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Oh, that goes into the Federal Treasury. Nothing comes to the State Department. The Congress then appropriates what it pleases. However, because of the fact that the revenues from these sources have been so cut down, I think, that the Committee on Appropriations at this time has lessened the appropriations of the State Department and the Foreign Service by $1,491,212.77. Just how the State Department and the Foreign Service are going to get along with this cut is beyond my comprehension. It has always been the proud boast of the State Department and the Foreign Service that the revenues derived from that service have almost, at times, equaled the expenditures for the service; but when the O'Connell bill came in and cut the revenues more than a million dollars, the State Department found itself behind. We are giving them more in this bill than they had previous to the passage of the O'Connell bill. In this bill they have a renewal at $5 for the two years. All they have to pay under this bill is $14 and the application fee of $1.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. I understand that within a year or thereabouts the Congress passed an act permitting the renewal of passports for six years. Now the gentleman proposes to make the renewal period four years. What is the reason for the change of mind on the part of the Committee on Foreign Affairs in this brief period of a year?

Mr. LINTHICUM. The gentleman is somewhat in error as to the six years.

A passport with the two renewals makes a total of six years, but a passport with one renewal makes four years. Now the gentleman asks why that change.

Mr. STAFFORD. Why should the committee change its mind within a period of one year?

Mr. LINTHICUM. I would like to say to the gentleman that I explained in the beginning the committee did not change its mind so materially, but that the Congress, on an amendment offered by Mr. Cramton, changed its mind. May I say further that the entire country has changed. We did not need the revenue at that time, whereas to-day we need every dollar of revenue we can get.

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, I am not speaking of the revenue feature. I am speaking as to the limit of time of renewal of passports. Congress within a year fixed the renewal privilege to extend over a period of six years. Now the renewal privilege is extended only to four years.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. What is the reason of the change of mind of the committee?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Because the Congress made a mistake, that is all.

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, the Committee on Foreign Affairs now thinks that six years is too long and four years is right, and, ipse dixit, the Congress was wrong.

Mr. LINTHICUM. It should not have been changed at any time. A man who desires to travel abroad and has a right to the service of the great United States in every country and every town in the world is certainly not paying too much when he pays $9 for a passport for all that service. [Applause.]

Mr. STAFFORD. That is not the question I am directing to the gentleman. Why should not the renewal be for six years instead of for fours years as recommended?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Because six years is too much at the present time.

Mr. BLANTON. Why does not the gentleman from Wisconsin make them permanent?

Mr. STAFFORD. There are certain instances where the citizens who have these passports have reason to renew them for a period of six years and not be limited to a period of four years.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Now, in conclusion, I say that this is an important bill. Certainly we are giving value received for every dollar they expend, and more. For this $9 passport and a renewal of two years, a 4-year period, we give the entire Foreign Service. We give the help of the State Department. We give all the power of the United States to enforce a man's rights abroad and to protect his citizenship, and if it is not worth $14 for a service of that kind for four years, then I do not know what it is worth. [Applause.]

The country needs the revenue. Why should we tax all the people of this country, people who have a little means, by a sales tax, by an income tax to sustain a part of the Government which these men enjoy individually?

It is only fair and proper that, in so far as it can, each department of the Government should carry its own burden, and the people who want to travel abroad should be perfectly willing, they should be happy, they should be glad that the United States has provided a service throughout the world for their protection. They may not need that protection, and yet they may need it badly at some time. So I say it is only fair and proper, in the condition of the country at this time, that we give this department a potential income of $700,000, divided up among the thousands and thousands of people of this country who want to go abroad.

Mr. BACON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LINTHICUM. I yield.

Mr. BACON. The original passport can be renewed twice?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Only once.

Mr. BACON. And that is in four years?

Mr. LINTHICUM. In two years.

Mr. BACON. What happens in the case of an American business man who may be representing an American concern abroad? What happens at the end of four years? Must he come back to this country to renew his passport?

Mr. LINTHICUM. No; but he has to get a new passport, and to explain his citizenship, a most important thing, every four years.

Mr. BACON. Can he get a new passport at a consular agency?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Yes; he can.

I want to say this is an important bill for your consideration. This renewal of a passport under the present law gives a man a right to stay there six years. There are thousands of people in Europe to-day who claim American citizenship who do not come to America if they can help it, and yet they receive the protection of this country and they remain abroad just as long as they want. I say that those people should have to pay and they should be compelled to pay in addition to what they are paying. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. RUDD. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 10 minutes.

I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, to revise and extend my remarks by including therein the names of the speakers and the members of the chambers of commerce who appeared by representatives at the hearing held in 1930 before the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. RUDD. The predecessor bill, which this bill seeks to amend, was introduced by my illustrious predecessor, the late lamented David J. O'Connell, of New York. My respect and admiration for him and recognition of his great ability in legislative work prompt me to oppose this bill.

He represented my district ably, intelligently, and well.

His was an active, an energetic membership in the business, social, and political life of our community.

He aided materially in the development and beautification of his district which he loved so much.

Those of us who knew him intimately will always cherish in their hearts and minds a kind and loving thought of this good man gone to his reward.

Mr. Chairman, it is with reluctance that I rise to oppose the esteemed chairman of my committee, but inasmuch as there were no hearings and no opportunity given to the commercial representatives and to the export people, I think it is proper that I should do so.

In order that I might properly present the case to you I have prepared four interrogatories, and I feel that if the membership will give them the consideration that I have given them they will bring about the defeat of this bill.

Interrogation 1. Shall a naturalized, law-abiding American citizen be denied the opportunity to visit the land of his birth, perhaps for the last time before passing into eternity?

Interrogation 2. Is it more important for the Government to take annually $689,426 by extracting it from the pockets of the poor or those of moderate means than for citizens to see perhaps for the last time their parents, brothers, and sisters and playmates of their youth, now grown to maturity?

Interrogation 3. Shall we protect and save the railroads and permit the steamship lines to be destroyed and driven into bankruptcy?

Interrogation 4. Is it just and proper that railroads, banks, and financial institutions be subsidized, petted, and caressed and the steamship lines, commercial and export business be slapped in the face and driven from the seas?

In my section of Brooklyn many women are resorting to cleaning in order to get enough money so that they may go back home to see their relatives and friends.

The chairman of this committee is going upon the supposition that none but the rich go abroad. As a matter of fact, the reverse is the fact. Out of 382,000 trans-Atlantic passengers who went abroad in 1931 only 60,000 were first class. Three hundred and thirty-two thousand were cabin, second-class, tourist, and fourth-class passengers. At the average rate of $85 per person, paying $5 for passports, $1 for the execution fee, and $5 for revenue tax, there is a tax of 13 per cent on this $85. If this bill should pass, there will be a tax of 18 per cent against these poor women who go abroad to visit their relatives perhaps for the last time. I submit that no other business, which has an inherent right to legitimately conduct its business, has to pay 18 per cent to conduct such business.

There is no deficit in the Consular Service. No evidence was submitted before our committee to that effect. But, as a matter of fact, the representative of the State Department said they were not interested one way or another.

This bill is the outcome of the mental operation of the chairman of our committee alone and nobody else. No Members appeared before our committee in opposition to it nor in favor of it.

I have a statement here from the representative of the United States Lines, made in 1930, to this effect:

> At hearings on the bill which resulted in the present law governing passport fees, representatives of the State Department discussing reduction from the then $10 rate advised the committee that passport fees were meeting practically the entire cost of maintaining the United States Department of State.

The Merchants Association of the city of New York states that the enactment of this legislation will materially increase the expenses of representatives of American concerns traveling in foreign countries, especially at a time when our export industries are endeavoring to maintain their foreign markets under extremely trying conditions.

Senator BARKLEY, of Kentucky, said on February 7 of last year, that we lost more than $2,400,000,000 of our foreign trade. It is a significant fact that about the same amount, $2,400,000,000, is the amount the United States Government is now in arrears.

At the hearings held in 1930 the following representatives appeared in favor of a reduction from $10 to $5:

Mr. Peter Fletcher, president National Council of American Importers and Traders (Inc.), New York City.

Mr. S. C. Mead, secretary and treasurer Merchants Association of New York, New York City.

Mr. C. A. Richards, chairman Foreign Trade Commission, Merchants Association of New York.

Mr. C. B. Dodds, Washington representative San Francisco Chamber of Commerce.

Mr. Ivan E. Goodner, Los Angeles Chamber of Commerce.

Letters were sent by chambers of commerce from all over the United States in favor of the reduction from $10 to $5. Why is it, I ask, Mr. Chairman, that none of these representatives were asked to appear before our committee? These are the organizations that appeared in favor of the reduction in 1930, and I am sure they would have appeared in opposition to this bill had an opportunity been given them to appear.

American Express Co.; National Council of American Importers & Traders (Inc.); American Locomotive Sales Corporation; American Manufacturers' Export Association; American Steamship Owners' Association; Bankers' Trust Co.; Berkeley Chamber of Commerce; Chamber of Commerce of Birmingham, Ala.; Red D Line of Steamships; Boise Chamber of Commerce, Boise, Idaho; Chamber of Commerce of Bristol, Conn.; Buffalo (N. Y.) Chamber of Commerce; Buffalo Exporters' Association; Spanish Royal Mail Line Agency (Inc.); Chamber of Commerce of Chattanooga, Tenn.; the Chicago Association of Commerce; Foreign Trade Association of the Cincinnati Chamber of Commerce; the Cleveland Chamber of Commerce; Dallas Chamber of Commerce; Detroit Board of Commerce; general agent of steamship companies; Elizabeth (N. J.) Chamber of Commerce.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York has consumed 10 minutes.

Mr. RUDD. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself five additional minutes.

Evansville Chamber of Commerce, Evansville, Ind.; Equitable Trust Co., New York; Fish-Schurman Corporation; Fort Wayne (Ind.) Chamber of Commerce; the Foundation Co.; General Electric Co.; General Motors Corporation; Gloucester (Mass.) Chamber of Commerce; the Goodyear Tire & Rubber Co.; the Grace Hospital; Grand Trunk Western Railway System; Guaranty Trust Co.; Hartford (Conn.) Chamber of Commerce; Chamber of Commerce of Houston, Tex.; Illinois Chamber of Commerce; International Harvester Export Co.; Madison (Wis.) Chamber of Commerce; Memphis (Tenn.) Chamber of Commerce; National Association of Credit Men; and International Mercantile Marine Co.

Here is a letter from the Chamber of Commerce of the United States of America. Surely consideration ought to be given to these people, as they represent the business interests, the commercial institutions, and the export interests of this country. If opportunity had been afforded them, I venture to say that chambers of commerce from every State in the Union would have been opposed to this increased fee. The Chamber of Commerce of the United States of America says:

> High fees for passports and visaing of passports are a burden upon the international travel necessary to commerce. However appropriate in wartime, the formalities incident to visas and to police control of passports are now an interference with commerce. Our Government should reduce its fees for passports and visas to a reasonable charge for the service it performs.

I submit this is no time to slap the steamship companies in the face, drive them into bankruptcy, and help the railroads, the financial interests, and the bankers of the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCREYNOLDS.]

Mr. MCREYNOLDS. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman who has just preceded me is the only member of the committee who is opposing or who did oppose the bringing out of this bill.

The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] seemed to be disturbed a few moments ago in his inquiries of our chairman, the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LINTHICUM], about the gentleman from Maryland having changed his mind within a year. Naturally, one would presume that the gentleman who made the inquiry never changes his mind.

I am one of the members of this committee that opposed the passage of this reduction in passport fees when it was passed, and the committee at that time reported out the usual fee of $10, and this was changed on the floor of the House. What we are desiring to do now is to place this back where it was and to eliminate the exception of teachers which was made in the former law, because we feel there is no reason why any exceptions should be made.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. RUDD] seems to be greatly disturbed and asked what he considered as some very serious questions.

Would you deprive a naturalized citizen from going back to the place of his birth? By what means are we going to prohibit that—by the addition of $4 in the passport fee? This is the difference.

Evidently, no one would start to visit the old country unless he had at least as much as three or four hundred dollars, and this $4 difference in the fee would only be something like 1 per cent. So I do not fear that anyone can be kept from making the trip on account of the material size of the increase under this bill, which is $4.

Another question propounded: Are you going to slap in the face the great transportation companies over the waters when you are rendering aid to the railroads of this country?

The Members of this House know that the Government has provided millions of dollars as loans to steamship companies for building up their lines, and they know further that millions of dollars are paid to them to-day in the transportation of mails which almost keeps them running without further income. So any talk about not being fair to steamship lines is absolutely ridiculous on its face.

As our chairman stated, this is the first measure by which we will work no material damage and by which we can procure some funds. In a short time a bill will be brought before the House providing for taxes, which is going to hurt. This will be done in an effort to balance the Budget, and this bill, as the gentleman from Maryland has pointed out, will mean more than $700,000 of revenue to the Government.

What objections can you have to this bill? Why should not a man pay $9, or $10 in all, if he is going to Europe? Why should he have more time than two years to extend his passport? The trouble is that we have many people in this country to-day who are American citizens, and who have gone to Europe and are claiming protection under the American flag, and yet they are staying there and simply having their passports renewed.

If they are American citizens and can not pay this, or if they want more than four years, let them get a new passport and they can pay the difference then; but my opinion, gentlemen, is that the people of the United States who can not do this would better stay at home. It is not going to hurt you if they do not go to Europe. We have had too much of Europe recently, anyhow. Let them keep their money at home.

The gentleman from New York says we had no hearings, and refers to the former hearings of 1930, and he reads you a great list of people who appeared before the committee. If the gentleman will read that testimony carefully, he will find that nearly every man who testified was not asking a reduction in the $9 as the passport fee but was asking a further extension of the right of renewal; and when that bill came in here it provided for $9 and $10, the same as we have it now, with the $1 extra fee, and it was amended on the floor of the House.

So it strikes me, gentlemen, that there ought not to be any question about this bill, that it ought to be passed, that it is just, and that it is placing the fees where they ought to be.

The steamboat people had representatives before the committee at this time. It was not necessary to go into extensive hearings, because extensive hearings had been held before.

So we come before you with, probably, the first bill, as the gentleman suggested over on this side a few moments ago, that will undertake to raise some revenue and put such revenue in the Treasury and help carry the great expenses that are now a burden upon the American people.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield for a suggestion?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. With pleasure.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. Nine-tenths of this money will be paid by those who can afford to pay it; is not that true?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. That is correct; and I thank the gentleman for the suggestion.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MORTON D. HULL].

Mr. MORTON D. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I favor the passage of this bill. I think it has been explained clearly to the membership of the House that the State Department is behind in revenue, that the passport fees are a source of revenue, that they come from those largely who can well afford to pay them. The passage of the bill will largely increase the revenue of the Government and help put the State Department upon a self-supporting basis. There is very little more that need to be said in support of the bill. It may work a hardship on some people. Hard times work hardships on all people. The burden of paying a part of the cost of the State Department will be borne by the traveling public who benefit from the Diplomatic Service.

Mr. SCHNEIDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MORTON D. HULL. I yield.

Mr. SCHNEIDER. Is there any change in the charge for visas?

Mr. MORTON D. HULL. There is no change. We do not make any change except in the fee for the initial passport covered by the bill.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. RUDD. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR].

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman, it is not two years ago since a proposal came before the House on a Calendar Wednesday to reduce the passport fee to $5. This bill before us now proposes to restore the fee to $10.

It is not for the purpose of discussing the details of the bill that I rise now, but rather to pay tribute to one of the most beloved Members of this body.

This bill must necessarily recall to us the sudden passing on December 29, 1930, of one of the most lovable Members of this House, the Hon. David J. O'Connell, a Representative in Congress from the ninth district of the State of New York.

We can recall Dave standing on this floor, less than two years ago, advocating his bill to reduce the passport fee from $10 to $5. He advocated it in behalf of the thousands of school-teachers and other citizens of limited means.

Mr. Chairman, no man ever came to the House of Representatives who had to a greater degree the love and affection of the entire membership than did Dave O'Connell. His smile was contagious; his handshake an encouragement for the day's work. Everywhere he went he brought with him sunshine to brighten the dullest gathering.

Standing in the aisle then on the Democratic side of the House, or on the floor, he fought valiantly and gentlemanly not alone for his own district but for the interest of the whole country. [Applause.]

What impressed men most who knew him well was his pride in his position as a Representative in the Congress of the United States. It was an inspiration to see the pride that Dave O'Connell had in being an important part in the representative branch of the Government of the country he loved so well. When we observe that there has grown up in this Nation an overemphasis on the importance of the executive branch, an idea that all things must come down from the President; that the Executive is the head and body and feet of Government; when Congress—both Houses—are often deprecated; when people in trouble in both good and bad times, seem to be impelled to rush first to the White House, our people are apt to lose sight of the fact that their Government springs principally from Congress, and more especially from the House of Representatives. [Applause.]

Dave O'Connell, more than any man I ever knew, had the correct conception of the position the House held in the governmental structure. He was proudly aware that the most honorable office in America was that of a Representative in the Congress of the United States of America. To know Dave O'Connell, to associate with him, to "pal" with him, to meet him from day to day was an inspiration. His friendship is a keepsake. [Applause.]

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA].

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I believe if I remain in Congress long enough I shall be able to take the floor from time to time and say, "I told you so." I opposed the reduction of the passport fee at the time it was first suggested, and I recall very vividly the fun that some of my colleagues poked at me when they asked me if I had abandoned the cause of common people. The bill as originally introduced at the time was clearly discriminatory. There was no real justification for the reduction of the passport fee when that was brought about. If I remember correctly—I have not had time to refer to the debate at that time—the State Department was not very anxious for a reduction in the passport fee.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. The State Department supported the bill as our committee reported it out, containing the $9 fee. The reduction was made upon the floor of the House.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Then I am right in saying that the bill as passed did not have the support of the State Department.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. The gentleman is quite correct.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, this is the proper way to go about a necessary change in legislation in our effort to balance the Budget.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. The bill was without recommendation from the State Department, but upon the initiation of the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs [Mr. LINTHICUM] this legislation was initiated.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. That is what I was saying. Let us take the case of the committee recently provided for, the Committee on Economy. That committee would not and could not have the intimate knowledge of the legislative history of this proposition that the Committee on Foreign Affairs has, which has been through it. The Committee on Foreign Affairs knows all about it, and is naturally in a position to come before the House and give all of the necessary information. I submit to my good friend from New York [Mr. RUDD] that the list of merchants and corporations that urged the reduction of the fee was read on the floor of the House when the previous bill was under consideration. If our export business depends upon whether a representative of American trade can pay $10 or $5 for his passport, then there is not much hope for American trade.

Mr. BOYLAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. BOYLAN. I am more than surprised that the distinguished gentleman from New York, who always represents the under dog, the hoi polloi, the proletariat, should now rise and favor an increase in the fee for passports. Does not the gentleman believe that an American citizen should have free communication everywhere, free to go to the end of the world, if necessary?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman from New York [Mr. RUDD] kindly give me that list?

Mr. BOYLAN. The gentleman has not answered the question.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Oh, I shall answer the question. I want to read off a list of the hoi polloi who are begging for this protection. There are some very common people here. There is the Standard Textile Products Co., there are Sussfield, Lorsch & Schimmel, Stroheim & Romann, also the Stern Hat Co., the Security Savings Bank & Trust Co., the St. Louis Chamber of Commerce, the Springfield Chamber of Commerce, the San Francisco Chamber of Commerce, the International Mercantile Marine Co. Those are the hoi polloi and the common people who first urged a reduction in the passport fee and who are now opposed to bringing it back to its old standard.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Those gentlemen did not ask for a reduction in the passport fee. What they asked for was a renewal of passports, to avoid the trouble of getting new passports.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Without a fee.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Without a fee.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. It is the same thing.

Mr. LINTHICUM. They did not ask for a reduction, and Mr. O'Connell's bill did not ask for a reduction.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. But these gentlemen asked for a renewal of passports without a fee.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. They are the hoi polloi and the common people for whom my good friend from New York [Mr. BOYLAN] is now shedding copious tears.

Mr. BOYLAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. In a moment. Of course I know my good friend would join with me in anything the real common people needed, but when an American citizen is able to buy his passage on a palatial steamer and go abroad where there are no restrictions upon his personal liberty, he ought to be willing to pay the $10 passport fee. [Applause.]

Mr. CULKIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. CULKIN. I assume the gentleman from New York includes the Budget in his present list of "under dogs."

Mr. LAGUARDIA. As I stated yesterday, I take the financial situation of the country quite seriously, but I can not join with some of my colleagues who are taking advantage of the deficit, and under the pretense of economy are centering a drive to abolish necessary bureaus and departments of the Government. I do not want to weaken the Federal Government, especially the regulatory departments and the supervisory departments that have required generations to establish, necessary for the protection of the people of this country.

I do not want to see these bureaus and departments abolished under this cry that has become so popular of balancing the Budget.

Mr. RUDD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I yield.

Mr. RUDD. On the question of the common people, does the gentleman question the statement of Senator BARKLEY, made on February 7 in the Senate, that last year we lost more than $2,400,000,000 of our foreign trade, and if that $2,400,000,000 of foreign trade was lost did it not affect these corporations whose names I have mentioned, and if it did affect those corporations did that not put the common people out of work and increase the unemployment? That is where the common people come in, and that is where the common people and the hoi polloi are affected by it. I submit in answer to the question of the chairman of our committee that had those people been given an opportunity to appear at the hearing they would have asked for the passport fee to remain as it was, $5. But I object to any hearing which deprives the people of the United States or the commerce and business and export business of an opportunity to be heard.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Now, in reply to the gentleman, whose question is fair, I do not question the figures given by the Senator from Kentucky that our trade fell off $2,000,000,000, but our trade fell off while we had a lower passport fee. [Applause.] And I say that the passport fee had absolutely nothing to do with the falling off of trade. I say it is not only childish but it is kindergarten logic to stand up here and say that the falling off of $2,000,000,000 trade is due to an attempted increase of $5 in the passport fee. I can not subscribe to any such theory as that.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I yield.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. Business men get passports good for two years for $9, and can have them extended two years more for $5 additional payment, or $14 for four years, which, it seems to me, is not an excessive charge on business.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Certainly.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. RUDD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD].

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I do not recall a time in my legislative experience when a great committee of the House—and certainly the Committee on Foreign Affairs must be classified as great, with the many luminaries there are on that committee—sought to reverse the action of Congress taken within 18 months, just because the action of Congress did not conform to their idea of what should be the policy of Congress. I think it comes with rather poor grace for a distinguished committee in these pressing times, when there is so much legislation of moment to consider, to propose such legislation. The chairman of this great committee, feeling aggrieved at the action of the last Congress in cutting down the passport fee from $10 to $5, brings this bill on his own initiative to try to restore the passport fee to $9.

Let us consider for a moment the inconsistencies or change of mind of this great committee within less than two years. I have the record here. I believe the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] has also changed his position on this matter. I hope the pressing demands upon the gentleman to go before the Committee on the Judiciary on short selling will not compel him to leave the Chamber.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I am very sorry, but I really can not remain.

Mr. STAFFORD. Well, I think the gentleman will be saved perhaps some feelings by not remaining. [Laughter.]

Within two years the gentleman has changed front completely. Two years ago the committee presented to this House a recommendation of the State Department that these passports should be renewed for a period of six years, and the evidence, supported by the Secretary of State, was the fact that it would be an imposition upon school-teachers who go abroad for more than two years and four years to exact from them the requirement that they should have their passports renewed at the end of every two years.

So the gentleman's committee brought into the House H. R. 10826, a bill framed by the Department of State, in which the essential purpose was to extend the passport feature to six years. Now, upon the initiative of the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, because the gentleman has received a rebuff, perhaps, on the floor of this House, cutting down the passport fee from $10 to $5, emasculates or attempts to emasculate, the policy of the department in that bill which sought to extend the passport privilege to six years.

Am I right or am I wrong? I yield to the gentleman from Maryland, the chairman of the committee, if I am wrong.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Will the gentleman put his question again?

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, life is too short. If the gentleman can not understand that, he could not understand a repetition of the question.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I will admit I do not understand all the gentleman says.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman understands me only when I am advocating wet proposals. [Laughter.]

When this matter was under discussion two years ago on the original bill just referred to, the gentleman from New York partook of considerable time, as he sometimes has occasion to do, without much warrant, and used the following language on page 9826:

> Now we come to the proviso which reads that the charge for issuing the original passport to a bona fide teacher, so determined to be by the Secretary of State, shall be $5. Why not make it $5 for everybody? That would remove all discriminatory features of the bill.

I believe the gentleman used both hands instead of one when he made those remarks. [Laughter.]

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield? The gentleman wants to be fair.

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, always fair, particularly to my friend the gentleman from New York.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. It was a proper observation in my opposition to the entire bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. Well, the gentleman took so much time that I have not come to the end of his remarks yet to see whether the gentleman was favoring it or not, but up to that time I realized the gentleman favored making a universal charge of $5. Perhaps the gentleman reversed his position before he concluded; but I do not have time now——

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The gentleman should read the entire remarks.

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, I do not have the time. That was one of the days when the gentleman was taking up an hour on Calendar Wednesday to illuminate the House. I do not wish to abuse the privilege of the House on this occasion.

Let me say to the membership of the committee that I was rather influenced in my vote in favor of the $5 fee because of the policy of foreign governments in exacting the same fee that we charge for our passports for the issuance of visas to our nationals when they go from country to country. It was called to our attention that over a period of 10 years foreign governments had protested against the policy of exacting such a large passport fee for their immigrants coming to this country, so they retaliated, and every time an American citizen would ask their approval of a passport to go from country to country those foreign countries would exact a fee of $10. It was for the purpose of trying to counteract that influence that I favored a cut in the passport fee from $10 to $5.

Now, the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] and others—in fact, all of the proponents of this bill—have seemed to lay stress upon the fact that these persons can afford to pay an increase from $5 to $9 and for a renewal of a passport an increased fee from $2 to $5.

Let me repeat the figures cited by the gentleman from New York [Mr. RUDD] as to the number of American citizens who availed themselves of the passport privilege. In 1931, 60,000 used first-class passage and 332,000, fivefold the number using first-class passage, used cabin, second class, tourist, and fourth class.

But, gentlemen, I am not surprised at the position taken by some of the members of the Committee on Foreign Affairs. The distinguished gentleman from Tennessee chides me because, perchance, I never change my mind; but I wish to say to the gentleman in all frankness that I come from a liberal State that sees the advancing trend of affairs. I am not affected by the circumscribed opinions of legislatures where they do not believe in the evolutionary movement of government. I do not advocate on the floor of the House the policy of raising a Chinese wall, as the distinguished gentleman from Tennessee did a few moments ago when he said that our people should stay at home; that we can get all the information we need within our own borders. That is a policy of self-containment to which I am opposed. It is rather provincial.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Certainly.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. The gentleman says he comes from that section of the country which is rather liberal?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes; most liberal.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Does the gentleman mean by that that he rides with the tide?

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, no; we ride with progress. We are not circumscribed by the narrow views of those who do not believe in the principle of evolution, which is accepted by all scientific thinkers. I will yield to the gentleman if he wishes to make an apology for the action of his State legislature in refusing to recognize the fundamental principles of science, in refusing to accept the principle of evolutionary biology. I know the position taken by the distinguished leader of the Democratic Party in 1896, when a few years ago he went to the State of Tennessee and opposed the accepted scientific principle of evolution.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. STAFFORD. Surely, for enlightenment.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Does the gentleman always want to enlighten the House by opposition? Has the gentleman ever supported anything that has come up on the floor? It is very seldom that the gentleman does anything but oppose any matter that may come up on the floor.

Mr. STAFFORD. That is too flippant a remark to be given any serious consideration. However, I will give it a serious answer. It was my high privilege, when the Reconstruction Finance Corporation bill was under consideration, again, when the bill providing for additional credits was under consideration, and also when the increase of bonded indebtedness of the farm-loan banks was under consideration to support them all, not only by my vote but by my voice. Maybe the gentleman was not in the Chamber at the time, but if he will refer to my votes on the floor he will find I have supported all of the legislation recommended by his party up to this time, other than the Tariff Commission bill that was absolutely emasculated by the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] and accepted by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP]. That amendment absolutely destroyed the real purpose of that bill so far as having Congress alone pass upon the reports of the Tariff Commission as to proposed changes in tariff rates.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. STAFFORD. Not for that character of question. I prefer to yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. CULKIN. Did the gentleman expect the gentleman from Tennessee to commit himself on evolution?

Mr. STAFFORD. No; but he did commit himself to a principle which I do not think represents the position of his party as to liberalized thought or economic thought. He committed himself to the policy of self-containment, which is not very dear to my heart, though it is very dear to the heart of many who are in favor of erecting a Chinese wall around this country so that our citizens may not go abroad to get any ideas.

The Committee on Foreign Affairs has not shown any reason why it is going counter to the recommendations of the State Department in advocacy of the renewal of these passports for a period of six years. The State Department two years ago, when their bill was under consideration—which had the favorable report of this committee—supported that idea. Now the gentleman from Maryland, on his own initiative, as I understand it, seeks to change that policy. It seems there is being spread over the country the spirit of intolerance, the spirit of "keep America for America," and that we should not allow our citizens to have any contact whatever with persons abroad for fear of contamination.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I yield.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Does not the gentleman think that if about 7,000,000 people went abroad right now and stayed abroad we might solve some of our troubles in this country?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes; and by this measure you are placing a burden on their going. There are many poor people who seek to go abroad to visit their relatives. This additional fee is nothing more than an additional charge on their going; but I bottom my objection to the additional fee largely on the encouragement it will be to foreign governments to continue to exact larger visa fees to American citizens in the approval of American passports.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes; I yield.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. May I inform the gentleman that the State Department is in entire accord with limiting passports to one renewal?

Mr. STAFFORD. Where is there any evidence of that in the hearings?

Mr. LINTHICUM. We have that in the hearings.

Mr. STAFFORD. Let me reply to that. Here two years ago, on May 29, 1930, we were considering H. R. 10826. A proviso in that bill, which had the recommendation of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, was to this effect:

> Provided further, That a passport may be renewed without additional charge, under regulations prescribed by the Secretary of State, for a period of not to exceed two years each, but the final date of expiration shall not be more than six years from the original date of issue.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. STAFFORD. I have hardly had time to get into the premise of this bill, but I do not wish to delay its consideration. I have already pointed out that the committee has virtually reversed itself and taken an opposite stand to the Department of State so far as concerns the length of the renewals. Answer that, if you can.

Mr. RUDD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. BOYLAN].

Mr. BOYLAN. Mr. Chairman, within the last few days, and perhaps to-day, we have many distinguished teachers visitors in our city here and in their presence we bring this bill up for consideration, but before speaking further about this I would like to say that the present passport bill was really the work of a very dear Member of this House, who has now passed to his final reward. Representative David J. O'Connell, of the ninth New York district, was a very prominent member of the Foreign Affairs Committee, a man who was universally loved and esteemed in this House, a man whose principal occupation and duty, assumed by himself, was to help new Members. He tried to ease their legislative paths at the beginning of their terms of office, and a singular honor has come to his memory. You will recall that he passed a bill permitting the gold-star mothers to visit the graves of their beloved ones overseas. In a beautiful park in the city of New York in October last a tree was planted by these grateful gold-star mothers to mark the memory and service to humanity of David J. O'Connell.

And to-day this bill comes up, the passage of which two years ago was a memorial to him in this House, and nothing gave him greater pleasure and particular joy than its enactment.

Now, what is one of the outstanding things in this bill? As I said, we have many visitors here in our beautiful city this week attending the sessions of the National Educational Conference, teachers from every part of our land, noble men and women who are doing God's work in formulating the youthful mind of our country. Many of these splendid men and women, devoting their lives to this splendid work, in order to have a wider vision, in order to have a better view, in order that they may have a full, rounded picture of world history and world events, in order that they may attend lectures in foreign universities, stint themselves in many cases of the very necessities of life in order to accumulate money sufficient to take a foreign trip.

Say what you will, gentlemen, everyone has admitted that travel is the greatest possible educator, and these splendid men and women, in order to add to their fund of human knowledge, take these trips. By this bill you are increasing the tax they have to pay for a passport from $5 to $9. There is absolutely no necessity for this, because we pride ourselves on our freedom of travel. We pride ourselves that an American citizen, under the protection of our flag, can go anywhere, and it is one of the things, to my mind, that we should be justly proud of.

Why should we endeavor to curtail the pleasure of our people by imposing an additional tax? It is well known, and we all realize, that there is but little pleasure in life as a whole, and when these little oases come during our period of sojourn here we ought to be willing and eager and anxious to help those who are in a position to make a little trip and to get a little pleasure go and enjoy themselves without unnecessarily adding to the expense of their trip.

I was surprised, I was deeply grieved, this morning when I entered the Chamber and found the valiant champion of the people, the friend of the downtrodden, the friend of the under dog, standing in the well of the House and addressing this distinguished gathering of statesmen and telling them that he favored an increase in the cost of passports.

Last year he came out and favored reducing the rate for passports for teachers, and I do not know what influences have come into the life of the gentleman that he wishes to revise his sentiments of last year and promulgate new ones this year.

I have here a letter from the Merchants' Association, in the city of New York. This association is an outstanding business association, for, I might say, the entire State of New York. Now, what do they say? They say:

> This association has always maintained that since a passport is a document which a citizen must obtain as an identification of his citizenship it is not a proper vehicle for raising revenue.

We firmly believe that passports should be issued at a fee which fairly represents the cost of such issuance by the Government.

The enactment of this legislation will increase materially the expenses of representatives of American business concerns traveling in foreign countries at a time when our export industries are endeavoring to maintain their foreign markets under extremely competitive conditions.

You gentlemen know, from our discussions on the tariff bill, that we were informed, and we know, that we have to sell 10 per cent of our products in order to keep our manufacturers and our industries going. These men, these representatives of the merchants and factories and industries, travel abroad in order to try and sell this 10 per cent of our products that we have to sell in order to keep industries moving.

Now, to continue with the letter:

We might point out that in addition to the cost of the passport itself this new legislation will make it necessary for travelers to secure visés from foreign governments and that the cost of such extra visés frequently exceed many times the cost of the passport.

We therefore earnestly urge your active cooperation on behalf of New York business houses and of the American traveling public in opposing the enactment of House bill 9393 when it comes before the House of Representatives.

Yours sincerely,

THE MERCHANTS' ASSOCIATION OF NEW YORK,
S. C. MEAD, Secretary.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOYLAN. I yield.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. Under the provisions of this bill, an exporting house can have a representative abroad for four years at a total cost of $14. It seems to me that $14 for the protection of a man traveling abroad is not excessive, when it is taken into consideration that he has the protection of his Government.

Mr. BOYLAN. I do not think the letter is directed so much against the renewal fee as against the initial fee.

I hold in my hand a letter from the American Manufacturers' Association, of New York, which says:

This bill deals with a matter in which the association has a keen interest. As an association of manufacturers interested in developing foreign business, we believe everything should be done that is possible to relieve the burden upon international travel necessary to commerce. In times of emergency, such as arose during the war period, we feel that high passport fees are justified, but we feel that these conditions are not in force at the present time. We feel that the charge for passport fees should be a reasonable one for the service that is performed. We have always taken a friendly interest in our Government's making reciprocal arrangements with other countries with respect to passports and visas, for we feel that the progress made has been great.

We are hopeful that the proposed measure will not become effective, for it raises fees at a time when the raise can least be afforded. The raise would tend to discourage foreign traveling, and we rather feel that everything should be done that is possible to encourage foreign traveling for the mutual benefit not only of our trade but also for our general understanding of foreign peoples and their problems in relation to ours.

Very truly yours,

FRANCIS T. COLE,
General Manager.

Mr. Chairman, the manufacturers have spoken, the merchants have spoken, and I have said a word for our traveling public, particularly for our splendid teachers. I trust that you will not add this burden at this time. Surely we have enough of additional burdens in the offing, with increased taxes on everyone, at the same time having reduced incomes, not by the passage of this bill to add the straw that is going to break the camel's back. In consideration of the memory of that splendid Member who labored with us here for six terms, and who left the present passport bill as a slight evidence of his humanitarian work performed in this House, I ask you not to pass this bill. [Applause.]

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, I yield now to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JOHNSON].

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I am not going to take much time in the discussion of this bill. If the House properly understands what the bill will do, I think there will be little opposition to it. Responding to the remarks just made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. BOYLAN] about our deceased colleague, Mr. O'Connell, for whom I had an affectionate regard, I suggest that conditions have materially changed since the passage of his bill. Associated with Mr. O'Connell in the passage of the bill was the gentleman from Virginia, Mr. Moore. He was just as active in his support of the bill as was Mr. O'Connell. Only the other day the chairman of our committee had a conversation with Mr. Moore on that subject, and I ask him now to say what Mr. Moore said with reference to that measure at this time.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I told Mr. Moore that he had made a very great mistake in supporting Mr. Cramton's amendment for a reduction of passport fees from $9 to $5. He said yes; that he realized that fact, and that if he were on the committee now he would be in favor of this bill.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Furthermore, Mr. Chairman, the bill introduced by Mr. O'Connell and reported out by the Foreign Affairs Committee did not contain a reduction in the passport fee but merely extended the time of renewal, as I recall, from four years to six years. The State Department at that time was not opposing the extension of time, but the administration of that measure has been such that the State Department, Mr. Carr speaking for the department in the hearings upon the bill, now says that having a passport the life of which is six years instead of four opens up more room for fraud with reference to the substitution of the person named in it, or the placing of it in the hands of other people, and the experience of the department has been such that they think four years and not six years should be the life of a passport. That is one reason why the committee has changed its view with reference to this matter, I suggest to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD]. The administration of the law was found not to be practicable with reference to having a passport for that length of time.

This is the only measure that puts money into the Treasury that has so far come before the Congress. We do not have very many bills of that kind unless they emanate from the Committee on Ways and Means.

This will increase the revenue of the Government at least $700,000, and will not tax the traveling public more than 1 per cent. I think that would be a reasonable estimate, because everyone who goes abroad will spend at least an average of $500. One per cent of $500 would be $5. It is less than 1 per cent. We are increasing the revenue to the Federal Government and at the same time increasing the cost to the citizen less than a fractional part of 1 per cent. I think the measure should be enacted into law. It will assist in balancing the Budget, and place no undue burden on anyone. It is true that some shipping interests and merchants oppose it, but likewise are they opposed to an increase in various taxes suggested before the Ways and Means Committee in the revenue bill they are considering. You can not propose any increase in taxes or in cost without hurting some one, but this bill hurts no one to any considerable extent and will increase the revenue of the Government and make administration of the law more effective than it has been. For that reason I bespeak its passage.

Mr. RUDD. Mr. Chairman, as a matter of fact, on an $85 fee for cost of transportation this will be an increase of 18 per cent. In the hearings in 1930 representatives appeared from the Departments of State and Commerce, the two branches of the Government immediately concerned with this legislation, which had their hearty indorsement. That was an indorsement for a $5 passport fee and for a 3-time renewal.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, I ask for the reading of the bill for amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 2 of the act entitled "An act to regulate the issue and validity of passports, and for other purposes," approved July 3, 1926, as amended by the act entitled "An act to provide for the renewal of passports," approved July 1, 1930, is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 2. That the validity of a passport or passport visa shall be limited to a period of two years: Provided, That a passport may be renewed under regulations prescribed by the Secretary of State for a period, not to exceed two years, upon payment of a fee of $5 for such renewal, but the final date of expiration shall not be more than four years from the original date of issue: Provided further, That the Secretary of State may limit the validity of a passport, passport visa, or the period of renewal of a passport to less than two years: Provided further, That the charge for the issue of an original passport shall be $9."

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. ROGERS, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 9393 and had directed him to report the same back to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. RUDD) there were—ayes 67, noes 12.

So the bill was passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

DAVID J. O'CONNELL

Mr. CULLEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting an address made by my colleague the gentleman from New York, Mr. BOYLAN, and other remarks made at the memorial services of the late David J. O'Connell, a former Member.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. CULLEN. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include several addresses at the exercises held by Gold-Star Mothers at Forest Park, Queens Borough, New York City, October 18, 1931, on the occasion of the planting of a tree in memory of the life and services of the late Representative David J. O'Connell, of the ninth district of New York.

The addresses are as follows:

OPENING ADDRESS BY MRS. MATHILDA BURLING, NEW YORK STATE PRESIDENT AMERICAN GOLD-STAR MOTHERS OF THE WORLD WAR (INC.)

Honored guests and friends, we are gathered here to-day to honor the memory of our beloved departed friend, the late Congressman David J. O'Connell, by dedicating a Chinese Elm tree as a living memorial.

It will be an inspiration to watch this tree spread its branches and reach to the height overlooking the surroundings which he loved so well. Mr. O'Connell took such great pride in participating in the various exercises held at this spot and watched it grow from a "lot" of wilderness and stones to this beautiful entrance. He had attended and taken part in every exercise held at this spot from the time we dedicated the site to the last dedication. Only a few weeks before he had left us he had expressed a wish that was never carried out, for he had gone too soon. I had mentioned at this time to him that our beloved park commissioner, Albert C. Benninger, had granted a wish of six years' standing and at last we were to have a permanent Christmas tree planted—which you will see has been planted in the center of our flower garden—I told him I intended to dedicate this tree to the children of the World War veterans.

"Well," Mr. O'Connell said, "now that you have the tree and will dedicate it to the children of the veterans, I want to be the one to dedicate that tree." He then continued, saying, "Now you have all your trees planted and all dedicated but one. What an inspiration it is at that spot. The new entrance, known as memorial entrance, memorial lane, leading into memorial drive, the beautiful buddy monument, the beautiful flagstaff and base, the memorial pin-oak trees dedicated to the memory of your boys, the beech tree planted in recognition of the sacrifices made by the gold-star mothers in the World War, and now the Christmas tree to be dedicated to the children of the veterans, what an inspiration." Then, jokingly, he said (as you know, his conversations were never complete unless he included some witty remark to bring out a cheerful spirit), "Well, I guess you have all the trees planted now but one and that is mine; when I die you can plant one there for me, but I don't know who will dedicate that one." He then added, "A living memorial is so much greater with the warm life in it than the monuments of cold granite or hard brick." Jokingly, I answered, "We can plant that tree for you; there will be enough somewhere in this big space, but that will be a long time off." He said, "Gee, won't that be great."

Little did I think that little joke would be a reality nine months later and be here to-day granting one of his last wishes in planting this tree. Dear friends, I know of the great interest Mr. O'Connell took in his constituents, not only his constituents but people throughout the whole country; he never asked, "Are you rich or poor, black or white, Democrat or Republican?" In other words, he never questioned race or creed or color; it was what he could do to help. He was a servant of the people and he served them as, I dare say, very few, if any, have ever served their people.

He was an outstanding figure in Washington, an inspiration to those in the House and Senate, both to Democrats and Republicans, and he was loved by all who knew him.

To the veterans of all wars and their dependents, to the postmen and their dependents, and last, but not least, to the gold-star mothers, he gave the best that was in him, never tiring of his duties. And I would like to say at this time that 5,500 gold-star mothers have been comforted by visiting their sons' graves in France during the past two years and it is expected that 1,000 more will go next year. Many of these mothers have never been away from the toil and labor of poor homes, many of them have never seen a boat or train; some were thrilled by the band at the pier, for they had never seen or heard a band of music. This act was the noblest act ever passed by Congress, and we owe it to him we honor here to-day.

I will close my remarks by saying that I really believe his wonderful life was shortened by the constant worry in his last days over the unemployment situation. The many who called on him for help, expressing their suffering and destitute circumstances through unemployment, and try how he did, his hands were tied; he could not help them as he wished to. Many times he told of how he laid awake night after night worrying about the many poor people out of work and trying to think how he could help them.

Dear friends, I hope you will always remember this tree, where it is planted, and what it was planted for. I hope it will be an inspiration to all as Mr. O'Connell was an inspiration to all who knew him.

I hope you will often take the time to visit this sacred spot, as Mr. O'Connell always called it—the most sacred spot in the city of New York—with its many memorials; and I hope that as time goes on we will often see a little bunch of flowers laid at this tree as a token of esteem and remembrance.

I thank you.

Mrs. BURLING. My friends, it is my pleasure to introduce to you the Rev. Francis A. Froehlich, of the Church of St. Thomas the Apostle, who will deliver the invocation.

INVOCATION BY REV. FRANCIS A. FROEHLICH, CHURCH OF ST. THOMAS THE APOSTLE

O Lord God Almighty, from whom proceed all holy desires, all right counsels, and all just works, behold us bowed down before Thy Infinite Majesty to honor the memory of one of Thy faithful servants.

In Thine unspeakable providence Thou wast pleased to number amongst our illustrious citizens Thy servant, our friend and Congressman, David J. O'Connell. His life, his character, his generosity, and his work will ever be held in tender remembrance by us, Thy children. Early in life, learning of Thee to be meek and humble of heart, he did not, by pride, provoke Thee to anger, but rather, in lowliness of heart, ever accepted as a good and faithful steward the gifts of Thy grace from Thy hands. Devoted to the keeping of Thy commandments, he walked fearlessly in the way of righteousness and justice; inspired by charity, he remembered Thy precept to love Thee above all things for Thy own sake and his neighbor out of love for Thee; fidelity to duty will cause his name to be ever green in our memory as the tree we dedicate to-day in his honor.

Grant, we beseech Thee, that whilst we lament his departure we may all bear in mind that we are most certainly to follow him. Grant that we may be found worthy to follow in his footsteps, that at our passing this world will likewise be a better place to live in as a result of our sojourn.

Eternal rest, grant O Lord, to the soul of David J. O'Connell, and let the perpetual light shine upon him. May he rest in peace. Amen.

Mrs. BURLING. Honored guests and friends, it is my pleasure now to introduce to you as the principal speaker on this occasion a warm friend and colleague of our late Congressman. He is the man who gave us much material help in the passage of the gold-star mothers' bill. It is my privilege to present to you the Hon. JOHN J. BOYLAN, Representative of the fifteenth New York district in Congress.

ADDRESS OF REPRESENTATIVE BOYLAN, OF NEW YORK

These exercises are ones that carry us away from the busy whirl of to-day and transport us to the land of yesterday, filled with fond memories of one who has left us for a little while.

This community pauses in the midst of its activities to pay tribute to the memory of one whose life work and achievements have made him a character of particular interest to it.

So we are assembled to turn back the pages of the mind of yesterday and in fancy we see our friend, David J. O'Connell, as we knew him in the days of his health and strength, of which he gave a full measure in the performance of his duties.

Fortunate indeed is the man who so lives that the good he has done in life so impressed his friends that they honor and revere his memory. Such a man was David J. O'Connell.

His passing was a loss not only to you home folks but to the entire Nation. What better record can a man leave than that of a fine performance of duty? Such a record is the result of the possession not only of marked ability but of undaunted courage and a high sense of honor.

To men of this caliber the Nation is indebted for their tireless energy and devoted service. Such indeed was the life of David J. O'Connell, to honor whose memory we are assembled here to-day. He was a man whose sole pleasure in life was service—always doing something for his fellow man.

In his representative capacity his every effort was to help some one. If we look over the record of the bills introduced by him—what do we find? We find he presented bills for increase of pensions for disabled veterans; increase of hospitals for veterans; to increase salaries and shorten working hours of postal and other Federal employees; to provide free textbooks for school children; to liberalize immigration laws to permit reuniting of families; for the relief of widows and orphans; and the bill providing for the pilgrimage of gold-star mothers to visit the last resting place of their loved ones in the cemeteries overseas.

You gold-star mothers know of his work for the passage of that bill. Your president, Mrs. Matilda Burling, who spent so much time and effort at Washington, is especially familiar with it.

In the Congress I was appointed as the New York member of the Committee on Military Affairs. The gold-star mothers' bill was referred to us for consideration. David O'Connell spoke to me about it. He introduced Mrs. Burling to me. Both of them kept on my trail day and night until finally I was able to obtain a hearing on it. I well remember that meeting of the committee. Obtaining the consent of the chairman I called the meeting for a Saturday morning; we sacrificed out week-end at home to endeavor to get the bill out of committee.

Due principally to the efforts of David O'Connell, supported by Mrs. Burling, we were successful. He watched the bill every legislative day until its final passage, and he was the first one to telegraph the news of its success to the gold-star mothers. He was also with us at the city hall when the first delegation of gold-star mothers to go overseas was welcomed by our city officials, and he was with us when the following groups of mothers were leaving. He was particularly happy over his success in securing the passage of this bill, because he knew the consolation and happiness it would bring to the gold-star mothers of our country to permit them to visit the graves of their loved ones sleeping under foreign skies.

You good mothers who have made the visit to the graves of your loved ones appreciate this far better than anyone can describe it.

So we are assembled here to-day to do honor to the memory of Representative David O'Connell.

It is indeed refreshing in these days to witness this expression of gratitude. Indeed, let me tell you that in the life of a public official expressions of appreciation and gratitude for services rendered are extremely rare; so that, the gold-star mothers' memorial to David O'Connell will stand out most conspicuously as an expression of their gratitude to his memory. What a beautiful thought—to plant a living tree in honor of a friend. It is just the sort of memorial that truly typifies his busy life, filled with deeds of service to humankind. You good women have done yourselves proud in your selection of the manner of perpetuating the record of the life and services of David O'Connell. It brings to my mind the beautiful poem by the late Corp. Joyce Kilmer, of the Sixty-ninth Regiment:

"I think that I shall never see
A poem lovely as a tree;
A tree whose hungry mouth is prest
Against the earth's sweet flowing breast.
A tree that looks at God all day
And lifts her leafy arms to pray;
A tree that may in summer wear
A nest of robins in her hair;
Upon whose bosom snow has lain,
Who intimately lives with rain.
Poems are made by fools like me;
But only God can make a tree."

The world is better that David O'Connel lived. He tried to smooth the pathway for others in their passage through life, and he was successful to a marked degree. You good mothers appreciated him and you have planted this beautiful tree to perpetuate his name. In the beautiful Inwood Hill Park at the northerly end of Manhattan Island, New York City, there stands a majestic old tree. It was planted by the Indians some 300 years ago. Under this tree they held their peace talks. A bronze tablet placed on it recites these facts, so that we of to-day may know its history:

The tablet placed alongside of the tree that you planted to-day will inform visitors to this beautiful park of the splendid reason for its planting.

Reading the tablet they will learn of the life and work of Representative David J. O'Connell and of the gratitude of the Gold-Star Mothers in planting it, so that posterity may have a record of the public services of a devoted Representative in Congress.

ADDRESS BY POSTMASTER HON. ALBERT FIRMIN

Madam President, beloved gold-star mothers, you patriotic veterans and friends of David J. O'Connell who are gathered here to-day to do him honor, I listened with great pleasure and interest to that very beautiful poem written by Joyce Kilmer that you heard but a few minutes ago, and that brought back to my mind two or three lines that were found in a little diary after one of the great engagements in the late war on the body of a dead private, Private Tetlow, and that brought back to my mind a characteristic of David J. O'Connell that I know will be of interest to all of you who are here assembled.

Private Tetlow was about to go into his first engagement, and he wrote these lines on the little diary that he had carried with him from home; the words were approximately these: "This day I go into battle for the first time. God give me strength to so conduct myself as though the whole issue of this great campaign fell and rested upon me alone." Everything that David O'Connell did, every cause that enlisted his strength, his industry, his zeal, and his enthusiasm was marked by that characteristic; that he went into it as though the whole issue depended upon him alone.

My friends, my mind runs back to David O'Connell in his early days when he was but struggling upward, laying the foundation for that fame that came to him in after years when his name was known throughout the United States for the character of the work that he did in Congress for the people of the United States, and in those early days back in the old neighborhood where he learned the foundation of his career that same high quality was characteristic of him. I have known him to toil far after midnight, working, doing his utmost to bring into his neighborhood the things that were worth while to bring to make that a better neighborhood and to make the men and women of that neighborhood better Americans and better men and women.

The Gold-Star Mothers to-day, who are responsible for this celebration, have shown a quality of loyalty that too frequently is not observable after a man has passed away, and I want before I close, and I am about to close, to emphasize another quality of David O'Connell's, which is the same quality that you Gold-Star Mothers are showing to-day and that you veterans have shown in the services that you have rendered your country—and that outstanding quality of O'Connell's was loyalty—loyalty to himself, loyalty to his family, loyalty to his party, loyalty to his country, and loyalty to his religion. With those two great qualities there is no wonder that you neighbors, you friends, you men and women who knew him through life, come here to-day to do him honor. His spirit is here, his spirit is in that beautiful sunshine, his spirit is in the stalwart oak that typifies the manhood of America. His spirit is about us to-day, and may it ever cling about that tree, growing as the country grows, ever upward, and typifying qualities that he had at the service of America.

ADDRESS BY GEORGE B. SERENBETZ, COMMANDER WILLIAM H. HUBBELL CAMP, SPANISH WAR VETERANS

Mrs. Burling and honored guests and veterans of every war, it is seldom that it falls to the lot of one who has been the lifelong friend of another to have had the honor to decorate him and make him an honorary member of the Spanish War Veterans of the United States and the camp which I represent. William H. Hubbell Camp, of New York, had the distinction to confer that honor upon him for his unswerving devotion to the interests of the veterans, their widows and orphans, of every war. It became my sad duty, which fell to my lot but a short time after I had pinned that decoration upon him with proper ceremonies for his service which he rendered in Congress—and I might say here that no man in Congress or in the Senate was instrumental in bringing about a vote, the first in many years which gave to the veterans of this country the pensions to which they were so rightfully entitled. No man in Congress devoted more time to the interests of the veterans than David J. O'Connell. Whether it was California or Maine, Louisiana or Wisconsin, his name was held in highest reverence by the veterans of the Spanish-American War and by the Grand Army of the Republic. One of the few survivors is at my right. Col. William Patten Griffiths, 87 years of age, who served under Lincoln. It was the men of this class that he had in mind. Republics, we know, are ungrateful but for the first time in almost 30 years this Republic was compelled to be grateful to the veterans of other wars, to the veterans of all wars, to the disabled of the Legion and to the Legionnaires, and we felt then that it was the proud duty of ours to confer upon him honorary membership in this camp, and then but a few short months had passed when it became my sad lot to pin upon him again that honorary cross which went with him to the grave and that was his personal request.

We, here to-day, take but a small part in the ceremonies, but what more fitting tribute could we pay to him who had rendered such service than the planting of this tree—like him, upright and courageous, its limbs spreading out in that proud charity for which he was famous, and its branches reaching on into the lofty heights, representing the ideals which David J. O'Connell held and adhered to during his lifetime. I know of no man in public life, and I have the honor of knowing many, who was held in such high reverence and esteem as the late David J. O'Connell; and, Mrs. Burling, it is the honor which you have conferred upon the Spanish-American War veterans to give us this opportunity to raise our voice and join you to-day in planting this tree which shall stand forever and beyond the years that we have to live, as your tribute to his proud charity, his understanding, and his love of mankind—and that honor, I say to you, Mrs. Burling, on behalf of the Spanish-American War veterans of this State, is one which we feel is signal in that you brought us into this ceremony and gave us an opportunity to speak a few words in behalf of the man whom we loved and revered—David J. O'Connell.

ADDRESS BY MR. JAMES PASTA FOR PARK COMMISSIONER BENNINGER

Mrs. Burling, distinguished guests, all friends of David J. O'Connell; as Mrs. Burling has told you, Commissioner Benninger is unable to be here. Up to an hour he planned to be present, but he found that that would be impossible, so he asked me to represent him.

The commissioner asked me to say for him that when Mrs. Burling first approached him and suggested to him the planting of a tree in memory of David J. O'Connell, the commissioner immediately gave his assent. The next question that came into his mind was what would be the kind of a tree that would most typify Dave O'Connell. We in the department of parks like to look at trees as good citizens, and every time a request comes into our department for the planting of a tree we know it is to make our community a better place in which to live. We knew the problem at hand was to select a tree that would be typical of Dave O'Connell, and so the commissioner selected a Chinese elm because of its rareness in this country, because of the peculiar growth of its leaves, because of its shedding limb upon limb in order to reach the heights that it finally does reach. That was typical of Dave O'Connell's life; his was a rugged struggle—you who knew him know that. He overcame obstacles in which to reach the highest pinnacle, and so to-day we dedicate this tree as a living memorial to the man and of that for which he lived. May it grow and grow and grow; and may we, in dedicating it, dedicate ourselves for the great things that Dave O'Connell did for us, for the fine love of country, for the love of family, for all that is worth-while; and in years to come his family must console themselves, as we his friends in Richmond Hill and Woodhaven do, with the fact that he lived up to all of his opportunities, and that Woodhaven and Richmond Hill and the vicinities which he represented are the better for his having lived there.

I can not say and I will not say that he is dead but rather that he wandered across into another land and left us dreaming how very fair it must be because Dave O'Connell is there, and in that spirit Commissioner Benninger dedicates this tree.

FLOWERS PRESENTED TO MRS. BURLING AS A TRIBUTE FROM GOLD-STAR MOTHERS

Mrs. Burling, on behalf of the Gold-Star Mothers I present you with this token of our love and esteem, for your unfailing work in our behalf, and may God bless you for it, and when your work on earth is done and God calls you to His heavenly home we are sure he will greet you with those kind and loving words, "Well done, thou good and faithful servant."

MRS. BURLING'S ACKNOWLEDGMENT

I want to thank you mothers for your very kind thought, and you all know I have always enjoyed working for those I love, and I love you, as I have our Congressman who had been so kind to us.

ADDRESS BY JOSEPH P. CONROY, COUNTY COMMANDER, AMERICAN LEGION

Mrs. Burling and friends of Dave O'Connell, as a representative of the American Legion and personal friend, I knew the man for years. I come here to-day to pay tribute with the others to his memory. He was a fine man, a good citizen, and a faithful public servant; and yet if we left here to-day just dedicating a tree, what a mockery this service would be.

This tree is to typify to all who are here, for all time—in our lifetime, anyway—the high ideals of his citizenry; and it should be for a faithful and great reminder in each man that we who are going through the paths of life should bear his ideals as our own, to the end that we should faithfully serve our God and country.

BENEDICTION BY REV. DUNCAN M. GENNS, ST. THOMAS EPISCOPAL CHURCH

Almighty God, with whom do live the spirits of those departed in the Lord, and with whom the souls of the faithful, after they are delivered from the burden of the flesh, are in joy and felicity, we give Thee esteemed thanks for all Thy servants departed this life in Thy faith and fear; and especially do we pray with fear at this time for Thy departed servant, our friend, the Hon. David J. O'Connell, and we beseech Thee that we, with all the faithful departed this life in Thy fear, many have our perfect consummation and bliss both in body and soul in Thy eternal and everlasting glory through Jesus Christ, our Lord. Amen.

SECOND POLAR YEAR PROGRAM

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Speaker, I call up the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 182) authorizing an appropriation to defray the expenses of participation by the United States Government in the Second Polar Year Program, August 1, 1932, to August 31, 1933.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maryland calls up a joint resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. This resolution is on the Union Calendar, and the House automatically resolves itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 182), with Mr. ROGERS in the chair.

The Clerk read the joint resolution, as follows:

House Joint Resolution 182

Resolved, etc., That, for the purpose of defraying the expenses of participation by the United States Government in the Second Polar Year Program, August 1, 1932, to August 31, 1933, an appropriation of $30,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby authorized for personal services in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, without reference to the classification act of 1923, as amended, contingent expenses, official cards, printing and binding, rent in the District of Columbia or elsewhere, purchase of necessary books, documents, and periodicals, camp and field supplies, scientific instruments and equipment, construction of necessary temporary buildings for housing equipment and for observations, hire, maintenance, and operation of motor-propelled passenger-carrying vehicles, transportation, and subsistence or per diem in lieu of subsistence (notwithstanding the provisions of any other act), stenographic and other services, and purchase of supplies, materials, and equipment by contract if deemed necessary, without regard to section 3709 of the Revised Statutes (U. S. C., title 41, sec. 5), and such other expenses as may be deemed necessary by the Secretary of State in furtherance of the project described, and the Secretary of State may transfer this fund, or so much as may be deemed necessary, to the Department of Commerce, with the approval of the Secretary of Commerce, for direct expenditure by the Coast and Geodetic Survey.

With a committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland is recognized for one hour.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask for recognition in opposition.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, this bill is a rather intricate measure, and for that reason I mailed to each Member of the House a copy of the hearings.

The Committee on Foreign Affairs has not taken up any bills for appropriations up to this time with the exception of this bill. We are conducting hearings on one other, but we have made no determination as yet.

This measure, it seemed to us, involved so much for the world of to-day and for future generations that we thought we ought to make this appropriation if it is possible to do so.

The bill is called the "Polar Year," which is rather a misnomer. Some 50 years ago what was called the First Polar Year was held, and for that reason this has been called the Second Polar Year.

In a very few words, the proposition is that there are to be some 80 stations established throughout the world, supported by various governments of the world. To certain governments are allotted certain stations, and to other governments are allotted certain other stations. Our Government is allotted a station at or near Fairbanks, Alaska. The idea is that at an instantaneous moment throughout the world the whole 80 stations will take observations, so that when all the data are gathered together the station in Alaska can say what happened at that station on that particular day at that particular minute, and the other stations of the world will be able to say what happened at their stations at that particular place and at that particular moment. It could not be brought to such accuracy 50 years ago when the other polar year was held, but by reason of the radio it can be brought to the very instant. The consequence will be that when the station in Alaska says that the polar lights appeared at a certain time and certain things happened, the stations of the world can say what happened by virtue of those polar lights at their particular station.

There is what is known as a "Kennelly-Heaviside" above us, a blanket, I might describe it, which encircles the world, some 50 miles above the surface, and which transmits the radio current into various parts of the universe. The station in Alaska or the station in the Argentine can say what happened at that station, and the stations of the world can say what happened to this "Kennelly-Heaviside," which encompasses the world.

I say frankly to you I do not know as much about these things as I should like to. I merely state to you that the blanket which extends around the entire globe is the great electrical force of the world. It is usually 50 miles from the surface, but at certain times it rises to a height of 80 miles, and sometimes it goes as high as a hundred miles, and that blanket is what transmits the radio current when we broadcast from our stations.

Mr. McCLINTIC of Oklahoma. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LINTHICUM. I yield.

Mr. McCLINTIC of Oklahoma. How many nations will cooperate in this work?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Twenty-six nations. They are Argentina, Austria, Belgium, Brazil, Bulgaria, Canada, Denmark, England, Estonia, Falkland Islands, Finland, France, Germany, Hungary, Iceland, Italy, Japan, Mexico, Netherlands, Norway, Poland, Spain, Sweden, Switzerland, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, and Turkey.

Mr. McCLINTIC of Oklahoma. Is it contemplated that those nations will all send out a ship and a separate expedition that will cover the different spots of the world?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Oh, no. These stations are on land. It will extend from August of this year to August of next year. Those 26 nations will support certain stations at certain places in the world.

Mr. McCLINTIC of Oklahoma. Will we build a station at the North Pole or the South Pole?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Well, I do not think we will get as far as the North Pole, but we are going to have a station at Fairbanks, which is 800 or 900 miles from the North Pole.

Mr. McCLINTIC of Oklahoma. When was the last polar expedition of this kind?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Fifty years ago; August, 1882, to August, 1883.

Mr. McCLINTIC of Oklahoma. And there has been nothing like that since?

Mr. LINTHICUM. No, sir. But certain work has been continued at the individual stations and by individual nations.

Mr. McCLINTIC of Oklahoma. Does the gentleman have in mind any particular additions to science that were given then and others which may be gained now?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Simon Newcomb was once asked, "What use is it to be observing the stars all the time? What benefit is it to the world to be observing the stars?" His reply was, "What use is an infant in arms?"

Now, that is just the idea. An infant in arms. Nobody realizes, nobody knows, nobody can comprehend what an infant in arms may mean to the world in the future. Thomas Edison—an infant in arms. Who could ever imagine what he meant to this world? So it goes right along.

The point I make is that this observation could be taken throughout the world at instantaneous times to observe what takes place at those times, and what effect it has upon other places in the world.

Twenty-four nations have appropriated and are going into this scheme. The great scientists of the world are interested in it. I think that the $30,000 which we are asking for is a worthy venture. I do not know what will be discovered. I do not know whether radio will be improved. I do not know whether static conditions will be eliminated, but I do know that we will have the facts of observations from all over the world. With the radio great possibilities are available. Instantaneous observations can be had throughout the world. When you realize that the man looking at "Big Ben" in London will not hear it strike as soon as the man at the radio in Baltimore. Radio waves travel practically with the speed of light, 186,000 miles a second.

I do not know what strata of atmosphere extend above. I do not know whether an airplane can travel faster farther above than it can near the earth, but I do know that when these gentlemen make these observations throughout the world they will know what strata there are and they will know the possibilities of the airplanes.

I do not know much about observations for the weather. We take observations now and we succeed in about 80 per cent of the forecasts. However, when they get these facts gathered from the world I do not know but what they can succeed 100 per cent.

I do not think we begin to realize and I do not think we know what this old world of ours and the surrounding atmospheres amount to, but what we are trying to do is to find out more for ourselves and for future generations.

I think it is worth $30,000 to find it out. The scientists all over the world are interested in this question; the Secretary of State has reported in favor of it; the President sends it to us and says he wants it passed. We have eliminated every possibility of expense except that which is specified in the bill and is absolutely necessary.

Mr. LANKFORD of Georgia. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Yes.

Mr. LANKFORD of Georgia. How long will these observations last?

Mr. LINTHICUM. One year from August of this year to August of next year.

Mr. FISH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Yes.

Mr. FISH. Is it not a fact that this bill was reported unanimously by the committee after very extensive hearings?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Oh, yes. I did not send a copy of the hearings to all the Members because I solely wanted them to pass the bill, but I sent it to them because I thought it would be useful to them and to many of their friends, because there is so much valuable information in this report. I believe it will be interesting, not only to you but to those of your family who are interested and those who surround you. I have endeavored to make the report as full as possible. It has been my practice to try to make the report carry the subject, because I know it is very difficult to get Members of Congress to read hearings, as they have so little time.

If you have a copy of the report, I want to show you that this whole thing is specified on page 3. The men who are to make the observations are allowed $12,790 for two years' work. It covers two years, because they have to get busy in preparing their instruments, manufacturing the instruments, putting up the buildings, and getting things ready. Then after the polar year is over they must make arrangements to remove the instruments, take down the buildings, and bring them to Washington, store them and take care of them, and finally make their scientific reports. Then for travel we provide $910; for publications, and that is the most important thing, we have specified $3,000. The publications will be sent to all people who want them—to scientists and to others who are interested, radio people, airplane people, and anybody who wants to know what was ascertained from these observations. Then we have specified $7,500 for instruments, $2,000 for buildings, $1,000 for absolute magnetic and electric observatories, and $800 for the transportation of instruments.

Gentlemen, some time ago—and I am not very proud of it—somebody came on the floor of the House and said some man had invented some particular instrument which would give power without much cost, and asked for certain specific legislation, which was granted. Now, this is a matter in which we can only be governed by what the scientists tell us. They have not asked for much. They have consented to the elimination of the provisions in the bill which are often carried in bills of this kind, by which they might receive more money than that which is specified. All they want is a chance to find out about these things, in conjunction with the 26 nations of the globe which have already appropriated money for the purpose. All we are doing is to establish one station in Alaska, near Fairbanks, near the university which was established by Mr. Rockefeller.

The men who are going to attend to this are going to live at the dormitories of the university, and they are going to pay very little subsistence charges, and we have cut it down to the lowest possible dollar that can be expended to carry out this work.

There are not many things in which I am personally interested, there are not many things that I am interested in further than the benefit it may be to my Government, but I believe that the enactment of this bill will mean something to the world. I believe it will mean something to every boy and girl interested in the questions of physics of to-day, and I believe eventually it will mean something to air transportation, it will mean something to radio, it will mean something to the weather reports, and I may say, in addition, in order that we might show you what other people are back of this matter, we had men testify from the various departments of the Government, and I made this statement in the report:

In consideration of this resolution the committee heard the following witnesses, who related the benefits of this Second Polar Year Program to their respective departments:

John A. Fleming, department of research in terrestrial magnetism, Carnegie Institution of Washington.

N. H. Heck, chief of division of terrestrial magnetism and seismology, Coast and Geodetic Survey.

Dr. J. H. Dellinger, Bureau of Standards.

L. J. Briggs, assistant director for research and testing, Bureau of Standards.

A. H. Taylor, Naval Research Laboratory.

W. R. Gregg, United States Weather Bureau.

C. G. Abbot, Secretary Smithsonian Institution.

These gentlemen have all approved this bill.

Mr. BALDRIGE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LINTHICUM. I yield.

Mr. BALDRIGE. Does not the gentleman think with a deficit staring us in the face this is one of the activities of Government that could be delayed for two years or four years without any serious trouble?

Mr. LINTHICUM. I do not know. They may discover just one little thing that will mean millions of dollars to this country and billions of dollars to the world.

Mr. MORTON D. HULL. Will the gentleman from Maryland yield to me in order that I may answer the question which the gentleman has just propounded?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Certainly.

Mr. MORTON D. HULL. This can not be postponed. Our participation is part of an international program that was organized three years ago for joint action by scientists of the various countries in observations which are to be made during a definite period, which begins in August of this year and ends in August of next year. If we are going to participate at all, we would better participate when the program is on. So that so far as this particular appropriation is concerned, we can not delay it. The work is going ahead whether we go into it or not, and this is the justification, as we think, for authorizing the appropriation of this amount of money.

Mr. BALDRIGE. In other words, the work will go ahead just the same, if we do not participate?

Mr. MORTON D. HULL. It will go ahead, but we will not be doing our share of it.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Let me state something to the gentleman which escaped my mind for the moment. Doctor Fleming says that unless we go into this work one-fourth of the globe will not have a station. The station in Alaska represents one-fourth of the globe, and if we do not go into the work that station will not be established and the observations will not be complete around the world.

Mr. SEGER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Yes.

Mr. SEGER. I came in rather late, and the gentleman may have already given this information, but will the gentleman tell us some of the countries that have gone into this undertaking?

Mr. LINTHICUM. I think I have them here; I believe I named them a few minutes ago. It would take me a few moments to look them up, but practically all of them are going into the work—Great Britain, Germany, France, Argentina, Brazil, and nearly all the other countries. There are 26 of them in all, and they are 26 of the largest nations of the world.

Mr. MORTON D. HULL. Including Soviet Russia.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Yes; Russia has also gone into it and has appropriated a very substantial sum.

Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McREYNOLDS].

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Chairman, perhaps I could give some information for the benefit of the committee by reading from a statement that was prepared by the department of terrestrial magnetism of the Carnegie Institution of Washington. I think this is information that the committee would like to have.

Beginning in August of this year and continuing thereafter for 13 months, the coordination of effort and cooperation of 26 nations of the world are to be directly toward solving the relation of the magnetism and the electricity of the earth and upper atmosphere to such very practical things in life as communication by radio, cable, telegraph, and telephone. Science has already shown that some relation does exist; the great international program of this year and next will provide further evidence and knowledge of the utmost value. The international aspect of the Polar Year Program is assured. Most of the nations participating are in the midst of definite plans and preparations. The United States has been asked to participate in the program and has been asked to operate a very strategic station. The station suggested is Fairbanks, Alaska. It is a station of the greatest importance to the entire program; other stations are so distant that results obtained at Fairbanks will have to be representative of about one-fourth of the North Polar region.

I think this is a very clear and definite explanation of some of the purposes for which this work is being done and what may be accomplished.

As this statement shows, most of the other nations have already made their programs and are making their arrangements to participate in this Polar region investigation.

Naturally, it is necessary, if we participate, to pass this legislation at this time. The $30,000 authorization is the minimum that can be used. We made a close and careful investigation of practically an itemized statement of the purposes for which the $30,000 was to be expended. In reading the bill that is offered, you will see that the expenses are well taken care of. In other words, these men who do this work at Fairbanks will receive their salaries, which include all expenses except traveling expenses back and forth.

Mr. THATCHER. Will there be any duplication of this work or will it be in collaboration with other nations?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. There will be no duplication; the stations are all agreed upon throughout the world.

Mr. THATCHER. What is the number of stations involved?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. One hundred and ten stations involved, and the station in the United States is at Fairbanks.

Mr. THATCHER. Will the American Government take up a certain phase of the work?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. It will do the same character of work as the others.

Mr. THATCHER. And then they will compare the results?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. They will compare the results and note the variations.

Mr. THATCHER. And then make their scientific deductions?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Yes. Mr. Chairman, I trust that this bill will pass.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD].

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, when I went over the report on this bill I was rather convinced of the necessity of our going on with this work, regardless of the straitened condition of the Treasury. Yesterday we passed the 4-department bill, and in the section referring to the State Department provided appropriations for the continuance of activities in conjunction with various other governments. They are established, and it is not the policy of our Government to withhold, because of the exigencies of the Treasury, from the continuation of that work.

So last year at Innsbruck, as the report shows, other nations, in conjunction with the representatives of the United States, decided that it was absolutely essential to continue the work from August, 1932, to August, 1933, and we would be a backslider if we should withhold the authorization for this appropriation.

Our Nation is too great to take the course of withholding the appropriation and have it heralded abroad that we are in so straitened circumstances that we could not contribute the sum of $30,000.

The only question that was suggested in the consideration of this bill by the gentleman from Nebraska was whether it could not be postponed 2, 3, or 4 years. The other governments, 23 of them, have decided to go ahead. True, we could throw a monkey wrench into the proceedings, and they could go ahead, but the work would not be complete, as has been stated by the chairman of the committee.

This is a joint action by all the nations; and here, I think, the Government must continue its appropriation, the same as we continue our appropriation for representation at the various courts of the world, by continuing appropriations for embassies and legations.

If this were the only government involved, so that we could take the initiative of determining when the work should begin, necessarily we would all vote for postponement of the work; but here is an essential activity of a high scientific order which I believe should go ahead, and we should not be the only nation in the world to withdraw our support from the pursuit of this high scientific research.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. BALDRIGE].

Mr. BALDRIGE. Mr. Chairman, it is not only in particular the $30,000 in this bill that I object to, but I have sat here along with other gentlemen from the start of the session and have seen the appropriations pile up and up. I remember very well the very first day we were here, when we were urged to spend three-quarters of a million dollars to fix up our old office building. The Committee on Ways and Means is doing the best it can to raise taxes, to get money to balance our Budget. With a deficit facing us, I do not have to show how serious it is for this country for 1 year or for 3 or 4 years not to be able to balance its Budget. It is not the $30,000 in this particular bill, but it is $30,000 here and $30,000 there. I think there should be a definite stop put to all these Government activities until we get out of the present crisis. I think a bill like this can certainly be postponed, together with a great many others making appropriations, and that it should wait until we can afford the expenditure.

Mr. MAAS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BALDRIGE. Yes.

Mr. MAAS. If it were a matter of merely postponing it, it might be advisable, but as a matter of fact it is a question of either participating or not participating. There is no question of postponement.

Mr. BALDRIGE. Then my answer is not to participate, because it is a Government activity that could be just as well left out. We are in a serious crisis and we ought to stop all these Government activities that are not necessary, and this is one of them.

Mr. MAAS. But the $30,000 investment that we make may bring us millions of dollars back in dividends from the knowledge that will be gained in conjunction with the other governments.

Mr. BALDRIGE. But that is rather problematical.

Mr. MAAS. I have the greatest sympathy with the gentleman's desire for economy, but if the other governments of the world can afford this, surely the richest government in the world can afford it.

Mr. BALDRIGE. The richest government in the world is not very rich just now. I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the resolution be read for amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That, for the purpose of defraying the expenses of participation by the United States Government in the Second Polar Year Program, August 1, 1932, to August 31, 1933, an appropriation of $30,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby authorized for personal services in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, without reference to the classification act of 1923, as amended, contingent expenses, official cards, printing and binding, rent in the District of Columbia or elsewhere, purchase of necessary books, documents, and periodicals, camp and field supplies, scientific instruments and equipment, construction of necessary temporary buildings for housing equipment and for observations, hire, maintenance, and operation of motor-propelled passenger-carrying vehicles, transportation, and subsistence or per diem in lieu of subsistence (notwithstanding the provisions of any other act), stenographic and other services, and purchase of supplies, materials, and equipment by contract if deemed necessary, without regard to section 3709 of the Revised Statutes (U. S. C., title 41, sec. 5), and such other expenses as may be deemed necessary by the Secretary of State in furtherance of the project described, and the Secretary of State may transfer this fund, or so much as may be deemed necessary, to the Department of Commerce with the approval of the Secretary of Commerce for direct expenditure by the Coast and Geodetic Survey.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 1, lines 8 and 9, strike out the words "without reference to the classification act of 1923, as amended."

Page 2, line 1, strike out "official cards" and "rent in the District of Columbia or elsewhere."

Page 2, line 7, after the word "transportation," insert "of supplies, equipment, and personnel."

Page 2, lines 9 and 10, strike out "(notwithstanding the provisions of any other act)" and insert "while traveling."

The committee amendments were severally reported and severally agreed to.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill back with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. ROGERS, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration H. J. Res. 182, and had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the resolution as amended do pass.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the resolution to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

The amendments were agreed to.

The House joint resolution as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the House joint resolution was passed was laid on the table.

PANAMA CANAL ZONE BOUNDARY LINE

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 7119) to authorize the modification of the boundary line between the Panama Canal Zone and the Republic of Panama, and for other purposes, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk reported the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maryland calls up the bill H. R. 7119. This is on the Union Calendar. The House will automatically resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and the gentleman from New Hampshire, Mr. ROGERS, will take the chair.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 7119, with Mr. ROGERS in the chair.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That with respect to that parcel of land in the Panama Canal Zone known as the Paitilla Point Military Reservation, title to which was acquired by the Government of the United States under the conventions concluded on November 18, 1903, and September 2, 1914, between the United States and Panama, the Secretary of State be, and he is hereby, authorized and empowered to effect with the Republic of Panama a modification of the boundary line between the Panama Canal Zone and the Republic of Panama so that such line shall then run as follows:

Beginning at a concrete monument marked "E," which is a point on the line on the north boundary of the Paitilla Point Military Reservation as shown on Panama Canal Drawing No. X–6053–1, whose geodetic coordinates are latitude 8° 58′ plus 4,445.06 feet and longitude 79° 31′ plus 923.50 feet, and following along a course of south 33° east for 790 feet to a concrete monument marked "F"; thence along a course of south 21° 45′ east for a distance of 490 feet to a concrete monument marked "G"; thence along a course of south 52° west for 870 feet to a concrete monument marked "H"; thence along a course of south 76° 30′ west for 780 feet more or less to a point marked "I" on the map, which is an imaginary point located on the center line of the Matasnillo River, which forms the west boundary of the military reservation. All bearings are true. All coordinates are referred to the Panama Colon Datum.

SEC. 2. Nothing contained in this act shall be construed to authorize the Secretary of State to convey or to surrender to the Government of Panama the title which the Government of the United States now holds in that parcel of land which may be detached from the Panama Canal Zone by virtue of the provisions of section 1 of this act.

SEC. 3. No civil or criminal case that may be pending in the courts of the Panama Canal Zone at the time this act shall become effective shall be affected thereby, either as to its present status or as to future proceedings, including final judgment or disposition.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WEST], who reported this bill.

Mr. WEST. Mr. Chairman, this bill deals with the simple problem of the modification of the boundary line between the Panama Canal Zone and the Republic of Panama. It has been found that there is a site within the Panama Canal Zone that is desirable as a site for the American legation. It is difficult, however, to have an American legation built upon territory that is technically within the jurisdiction of the United States. The purpose of this bill, therefore, is to take this parcel of land known as Paitilla Point and transfer it, technically, to the jurisdiction of the Republic of Panama. We regain jurisdiction because of the building there of an American legation.

According to a convention between the United States and the Republic of Panama for the construction of a ship canal, which was signed at Washington on November 18, 1903, and proclaimed February 26, 1904, it is provided as follows:

The Republic of Panama grants to the United States in perpetuity the use, occupation, and control of a zone of land and land under water for the construction, maintenance, operation, sanitation, and protection of said canal of the width of 10 miles extending to the distance of 5 miles on each side of the center line of the route of the canal to be constructed * * *.

Within the 10-mile strip was included Paitilla Point and the territory around it.

Later it was desired to adjust the boundaries as between the Canal Zone and the Republic of Panama. Therefore, the convention of September 2, 1914, changed the boundary line to accomplish this purpose—Article III—and Paitilla Point was a part of the territory retroceded to Panama by so changing the boundary line.

Under date of July 12, 1918, the Governor of the Panama Canal Zone wrote a note to the President of the Republic of Panama, stating in part as follows:

In accordance with the provisions of article 2 of the Hay-Varilla treaty, I have the honor to inform you that certain territory at Paitilla Point * * * is required for the defense of the Panama Canal.

Paitilla Point was then taken over by the Panama Canal Zone under the following provision of Article II of the treaty of November 18, 1903:

* * * The Republic of Panama further grants to the United States in perpetuity the use, occupation, and control of any other lands and waters outside of the zone above described which may be necessary and convenient for the construction, maintenance, operation, sanitation, and protection of the said canal or of any auxiliary canals or other works necessary and convenient for the construction, maintenance, operation, sanitation, and protection of the said enterprise.

Under the following provision of Article VI of the same treaty compensation was made to the owners of the land taken over—Paitilla Point—in the amount of $160,000 (certificate of settlement dated October 30, 1930):

All damages caused to the owners of private lands or private property of any kind by reason of the grants contained in this treaty or by reason of the operations of the United States, its agents or employees, or by reason of the construction, maintenance, operation, sanitation, and protection of the said canal or of the works of sanitation and protection herein provided for, shall be appraised and settled by a joint commission appointed by the Governments of the United States and the Republic of Panama, whose decisions as to such damages shall be final and whose awards as to such damages shall be paid solely by the United States.

It is a portion of this Paitilla Point which it is desired to place within the boundary of the Republic of Panama.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEST. I yield.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I understand that the title to this land remains in the Government of the United States. Is that true?

Mr. WEST. Yes; it is true. According to Article VI of this treaty just referred to, which provided for the payment of $160,000, according to a certificate of settlement dated October 30, 1930.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. This transaction, then, is a mere technical proposition, to secure a site for a legation?

Mr. WEST. Mr. Chairman, in answer to the point raised by the gentleman from Ohio, the answer is simply the explanation of the purpose of this bill. Here is land within the Canal Zone which is desirable as a site for a legation. We can not build a legation upon our own territory, nor upon territory under our jurisdiction. Therefore we bring about a technical modification of the boundary line to take this territory out of the jurisdiction of the Canal Zone and of the United States, put it under the jurisdiction, technically in international law, of the Republic of Panama, in order that Panama can yield that jurisdiction back to us in connection with the practice of diplomatic immunity and exemption from jurisdiction accorded to legations.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Does it involve the expenditure of any money on the part of the United States?

Mr. WEST. It involves no expenditure of any money, but, on the contrary, brings about a decided advantage to our country, because it saves us the necessity of purchasing a site within the city of Panama.

Mr. CLANCY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEST. I yield.

Mr. CLANCY. Is this change in the location of the legation made also for the purpose of providing more desirable working quarters? The present legation in Panama City is right downtown, and it is very hot and uncomfortable.

Mr. WEST. I understand that to be very true. I have never been in Panama, but I understand that the site within the city is very undesirable; but that this point is out near the ocean and as comfortable as any place could be in Panama.

Mr. CLANCY. Can the gentleman also state whether it provides greater security for the legation in case of disorders or rebellions or revolutions?

Mr. WEST. My judgment is that it would provide greater security, because there is a definite provision in this bill containing reservations made by the War Department with reference to the control of military roads in this fort. In fact, the security of the legation would be greater than if it were located technically within their jurisdiction, because there is a reservation of all of the rights that we have under the treaty with the Republic of Panama, rights for the use, occupation, and military control of roads. So that we have all of the advantages that we possessed before the enactment of this bill transferring jurisdiction, and we gain back, technically, the transfer of jurisdiction under diplomatic immunity and the practice of exemption of legations from local jurisdiction.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH.].

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed out of order for 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, a few days ago a number of very distinguished college professors and other eminent men of this country sent a round-robin letter to the President of the United States asking him to join with the League of Nations in any proposed embargo or boycott against Japan. I do not question the good faith of these gentlemen or the sincerity of their motives for peace. They have been advocates of peace for many years past; but, as one who loathes and despises war, who is opposed to war with Japan at the present time unless we are attacked, I say to you that a boycott is the first step toward war. We can not join with the League of Nations or anyone else in a boycott against Japan without being dragged into war, because an American ship, flying the American flag, would start from some port in our country for Shanghai, and just as soon as it got there Japan would blockade Shanghai, would seize our ship, and that would lead, of course, to the most serious kind of difficulties, if not to actual warfare.

Therefore I hope the President of the United States and the Congress will make it known that we do not propose in any way to go along with the League of Nations to establish a boycott of Japan, because if there is any trouble the first thing that would happen American soldiers would be called upon to do the fighting if there is any fighting to be done. We do not propose always to pull foreign chestnuts out of the fire for every nation. We have no mandate to preserve the peace of the world. We have been a Santa Claus long enough for all the foreign nations, and we have no mandate to preserve the lives of missionaries or business men who do not come out of the battle zone.

So I say to you there is far too much thought and talk and alarm of war in the United States at the present time. There is no cause whatever for us to go to war with Japan. There is nothing we want from Japan. There is nothing we can get from Japan. On the other hand, the younger element of the United States, those from 14 to 22, think of war now as a great adventure and are all talking in terms of war. This kind of hysteria is just waiting around to be fanned into a blaze that will create a war spirit and eventuate in war with Japan.

We have no mandate to make China safe for the Chinese, nor have we any mandate to preserve the peace of the world by sending American soldiers to Manchuria.

I think all Americans deplore the brutality of the Japanese at Shanghai and the savagery of the Japanese soldiers in their brutal attacks upon an unarmed city. Nevertheless, that is not our business and, of course, it is no cause for war and no cause for thought or talk of war in the United States. We have enough to do in taking care of our own problems back home.

Mr. BLACK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. Yes.

Mr. BLACK. I would like to know the gentleman's opinion as to the obligations coming to us by reason of the adoption of the Kellogg pact.

Mr. FISH. I believe the United States has a very definite obligation to serve notice upon Japan, because of its flagrant violation and trampling upon the Kellogg-Briand pact and upon the 9-power pact, and that that notice should have been served by the State Department in such a way that it would have been published in every paper in the world, but after that we should have ceased this long-distance bombardment of Japan by a lot of useless notes. I am not in sympathy with the constant long-distance bombardment of Japan with notes by the State Department. It only causes irritation, and makes it impossible for the President of the United States to step in and offer to mediate and arbitrate, just as was done by former President Roosevelt during the Japanese-Russian War. We should stop sending notes every time Japan takes a little Manchurian city. We should use our good offices to bring about peace in China and peace in the world without acting in conjunction with the League of Nations or by going into some form of boycott which leads inevitably to war.

Mr. MORTON D. HULL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. Yes.

Mr. MORTON D. HULL. Will the gentleman tell us how he would do this?

Mr. FISH. Do what?

Mr. MORTON D. HULL. Bring about peace.

Mr. FISH. I would certainly have the President of the United States offer to mediate the difficulties between China and Japan. We may not be in the position to do that at the present time, due to the numerous notes that we have been sending to Japan. If we would only stop sending these notes, then I believe the President of the United States could consistently step in and offer to arbitrate between Japan and China. Although I am opposed to boycotts which lead to war, I am in favor of an embargo in this country, prohibiting the shipment of arms, munitions, and implements of war to all nations. I would give the power to the President of the United States to prohibit the shipment of arms and munitions of war, made by our manufacturers for the sake of profit and greed, to kill and destroy human beings with whom we are at peace. I know I speak the voice of the American people, that they have no sympathy whatever in permitting our manufacturers, for the sake of profit and greed, to send munitions of war to Japan in order to kill the Chinese. Furthermore, only the big nations, the nations that have the biggest navies, will get the munitions of war shipped from the United States.

I am opposed to having the United States the potential slaughterhouse of the world and the symbol of munitions of war.

Mr. HARLAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. Yes.

Mr. HARLAN. Would the gentleman not believe, then, if that policy were followed universally, that every nation, the small nations as well as the great ones, would have to build up their own munition plants in order to defend themselves, and, furthermore, in the event the United States should subsequently become involved in war, we would be unable to purchase supplies ourselves?

Mr. FISH. One question at a time, and I shall answer the last question first.

The surest way to become involved in war, anywhere in the world, is to ship munitions of war. That is the first step toward war, because it causes the hatred of the country that does not get the munitions. In the second place, of course, I agree with the gentleman that it would be preferable, if all nations would agree, not to sell munitions or to export munitions of war; but we, with our great industries, to-day are the potential market for all wars, wherever they may be.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman two additional minutes.

Mr. HARLAN. Would not that compel the smaller nations to maintain munition plants in the same way that large nations maintain them or else be absolutely defenseless?

Mr. FISH. I do not care a bit whether the small nations maintain munition factories or not; that is their problem, not our responsibility. Whether nations have munitions or do not have munitions or whether they go to war or do not go to war, the fact is, to-day, no matter where there is a war in the world, they buy munitions from our manufacturers, helping to drag us into every war, whether it is in China or whether it is in Europe; and the time has come when we have got to solve the question of whether we want to go to war in defense of the war profiteers or in defense of America; and I say to you, as one Member of Congress, I do not ever propose to vote again to go to war in defense of the war profiteers. If we have to go to war, it will be in defense of our own interests and not in defense of those that make munitions of war.

Mr. MANLOVE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. Yes.

Mr. MANLOVE. As I understand it, the gentleman's first proposition is that he would not favor the United States joining with the other nations of the world in an embargo against supplies for Japan, and now, as I understand it, he favors an embargo against the United States exporting war supplies individually, or so far as our own Nation is concerned.

Mr. FISH. Exactly.

Mr. MANLOVE. I will ask the gentleman how far he would go with that? Would the gentleman favor an embargo against our cotton supplies that Japan has been buying?

Mr. FISH. No; nothing except ammunition, arms, and other implements of war.

Mr. HOPKINS. And not any raw material?

Mr. FISH. No raw materials at all; nothing but arms, munitions, and implements of war.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CLANCY].

Mr. CLANCY. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH], who preceded me, has emphasized the importance of the diplomat with regard to whether we have peace or war, and the bill under consideration aims to provide better housing, more comfortable and more secure housing, for our key diplomat in Latin America, the minister to Panama.

The United States has tried hard in recent years to win and retain the friendship of the 19 Latin American Republics. Their trade with us amounted to $2,000,000,000 per year before the depression set in. Practically all the diplomats of these 19 Latin American countries pass through this crossroad, the Panama Canal and Panama City, and generally meet our Minister to Panama.

The United States has been fortunate in the last two Ministers to Panama, whom I have known personally. They are Americans of the very highest type, Dr. John South, of Kentucky, who spent as minister a large private fortune in creating better relations with the Latin American countries, and the present minister, Roy Davis, of Missouri, who has had much experience in our diplomatic service and is one of our finest diplomats abroad.

Both of these men are highly trained and peculiarly well qualified and are men of the highest courage personally, and in the handling of their public duties in the past few years have gladly risked their lives several times to save the lives and property of others.

Dr. John South a few years ago stepped in between two contending armies, if I may call them armies, as they were hastily improvised, that were bent on bloodshed, and averted a miniature war in Panama by arguing with the leaders.

The revolution on January 1, 1930, in Panama, sprang up very suddenly at 2.30 o'clock in the morning, and in four hours the rebels had captured the president's palace and overthrown the government and made it not a rebellion but a real revolution. When the revolutionists had entered the president's palace by the back door, after having failed in a surprise storm attack, the president and his wife and his family and his guards were in great danger.

Roy Davis, the American minister, made his way through the zone of fire and pleaded for the lives of the president and his wife and family.

This former President of Panama was a friend of the United States. It was a dangerous thing for Roy Davis to go down the street to the palace, because a newspaperman, a friend of mine, had tried to go down the same street just before this and was shot twice, once in the throat and once in the abdomen, and died a few days later.

Minister Davis should be highly regarded and well treated by this Republic, because he is an invaluable servant.

His salary and expense allowance is insufficient for his duties, and he should be amply provided for.

The site of the present legation is in a rather unpleasant neighborhood down town for a residence in a very ancient city with narrow streets and a tropical climate. This magnificent old city of Panama has been a city of sudden death, which for hundreds of years was ravaged occasionally by bandits and pirates and subject to revolutions and disorders.

The United States Government has at Panama one of its greatest military assets, offensive and defensive—the Panama Canal—and has had to recognize the policy regarding the Republic of Panama as an adjunct to the Panama Canal, which must be guarded at all costs.

Certainly we should remove this legation farther out of the city, as this bill provides.

What this bill aims to do is to place the American legation outside, on this point, where the minister and his family and possible refugees will be safe, and where he can work more comfortably to better advantage in keeping the worthy people of that territory friendly to the United States, and free of all disturbances which might threaten life and property. Therefore, I hope that this bill will pass. [Applause.]

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, I want the committee to understand this bill. It is to transfer a small point of land to the Panama Government, so that we can erect there a legation. We can not erect a legation in our own territory. After the legation is erected it comes under our jurisdiction, because it is our legation.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LINTHICUM. I yield.

Mr. STAFFORD. What prevents us from erecting a legation within the confines of the Canal Zone?

Mr. LINTHICUM. I do not know whether there is any legislation against it, but it would be a singular thing to erect a legation in our own country for Panama. It has never been done, and it would be a peculiar situation. But if we give jurisdiction to Panama, when we do erect a legation, it comes under our jurisdiction again.

Mr. WEST. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LINTHICUM. I yield.

Mr. WEST. According to the treaty—and this will answer the question of the gentleman from Wisconsin—between the United States and the Republic of Panama, the United States agrees to the use, occupation, and control of the Canal Zone, with the sovereignty legally under international law, in the Republic of Panama. The United States simply by that treaty gains jurisdiction over the Canal Zone. Now, according to this proposed resolution, that jurisdiction which we have gained is transferred back to Panama, and then Panama yields that jurisdiction back to us when we erect a legation on that territory, according to the practice of exemption from jurisdiction that exists in international law for legations.

Mr. STAFFORD. I am familiar with the rule of international law which applies between our country and Panama, whereby we have control of the Canal Zone for a period of 999 years. However, that very subject suggests the query as to the phraseology of section 2 of the bill, which says:

> Nothing contained in this act shall be construed to authorize the Secretary of State to convey or to surrender to the Government of Panama the title which the Government of the United States now holds in that parcel of land which may be detached from the Panama Canal Zone by virtue of the provisions of section 1 of this act.

The United States has no title to any parcel of land in the Canal Zone; it has a leasehold, exclusively. Is not the committee rather at variance with the existing facts in referring to the leasehold that the Government has in the Canal Zone by saying "the title" the United States has in that territory?

Mr. WEST. "Title" does not merely mean fee simple. Title may be a term to designate that degree of control over that land possessed by the United States. May I read a quotation from a letter from the War Department agreeing to this transfer, dated October 3, 1928?

Mr. STAFFORD. I have read that, and that very letter rather suggested the idea that the War Department officials thought the National Government had title to the Canal Zone. We have a leasehold interest, a defeasible title.

Mr. WEST. That is as regards public jurisdiction over it. There is no title in the sense the gentleman refers to.

Mr. STAFFORD. Yet the War Department says, as one of three conditions, that this property shall be transferred when the "private title thereto remains in the Government of the United States." In the general acceptance of the word "title" it means fee simple. I agree with the gentleman that a leasehold might be considered title, but in the general acceptance of the term it means fee simple.

Mr. WEST. I think the point is well raised, but these three reservations of the War Department are not embodied in the act itself for the reason that the gentleman has indicated. It is simply that these reservations will be placed in the notes that will be exchanged between our Government and Panama.

Mr. STAFFORD. Yet you do cover the condition of the War Department so far as saying that this act shall not be considered as transferring any title that the United States may have in the Canal Zone.

Mr. WEST. Yes; that is to restrict the operation of this act simply to the technical matter of jurisdiction and leave the use, the control of, the operation of, or whatever degree of title that may be referred to, as it now is, so that there will be no alteration in the present status of that exact parcel of land. It is simply the technical transfer of jurisdiction.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman will agree that the word "title" without any other phrase would connote the idea of full fee-simple title?

Mr. WEST. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Although it may involve the idea of a defeasible title, which this Government merely has in the Canal Zone?

Mr. WEST. Yes.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEST. Yes.

Mr. TILSON. I wish to ask the gentleman from Maryland a question. Is it the intention of the committee that the new legation shall be built at this point?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Yes. Mr. Porter, when he was alive, went to Panama and looked at the old legation, which was opposite a square in the center of the city, and thought it was inadvisable to build there. He looked at this point and was much pleased with it.

Mr. TILSON. Has the gentleman himself been to Panama to look this property over?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Yes.

Mr. TILSON. Does not the gentleman think it is rather far out from the city?

Mr. LINTHICUM. It is about 2 miles. It is a splendid site for a legation, and Mr. Porter's idea was that they would have an office down town but that the legation would be built at this point.

Mr. TILSON. Would it not be better if it were placed nearer to the city, somewhere near the British Legation, for instance?

Mr. LINTHICUM. I can not agree with the gentleman that you want to go into the town of Panama if you can keep out of it, but there will be an office for visa purposes and all that sort of thing in town. That was Mr. Porter's idea.

Mr. TILSON. The British Legation is not down town as ours is at present, but the proposed location is so far out that it seems to me it will be somewhat isolated.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I drove from there into the center of the town in about 10 minutes.

Mr. TILSON. Oh, in 10 minutes one can go quite a distance in a motor car. There is swamp land back of it, as I now remember. I do not know about the mosquitoes, whether this swamp will breed mosquitoes or not, but it seems to me that it is putting the legation too far away from the city of Panama for the convenience or comfort of our representatives there.

Mr. LINTHICUM. This bill was drafted by the State Department, and it is approved by the Secretary of State, by the President, and by the Foreign Service Building Commission.

Mr. HORR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Ohio yield?

Mr. WEST. Yes.

Mr. HORR. The gentleman called attention to the fact that the title would not be sacrificed in case this was ever abandoned. Clearly there must be a transfer to Panama. How would that revert again to the United States, from a legal standpoint?

Mr. WEST. The question can be answered by the statement that if this bill should be enacted by the Congress it is proposed to effect the contemplated modification by an exchange of notes containing the conditions that have been proposed by the War Department. The third condition proposed by the War Department is as follows:

> Should the property ceded cease to be used by the State Department it shall be ceded back to the United States and returned to the control of the War Department.

That point will be protected in the exchange of notes between the State Department and the Republic of Panama. These reservations will be included in the notes exchanged.

In order to make this proposal perfectly clear, Mr. Chairman, may I say again in conclusion that the purpose of this bill is simply the modification of the existing boundary line between the Panama Canal Zone and the Republic of Panama, so far as it affects that parcel of land in the Panama Canal Zone known as the Paitilla Point Military Reservation?

It has been found advisable to use a portion of this land as the site for the erection of a residence for the American minister to Panama. It is necessary that such a residence be located within the boundaries of the Republic of Panama. By Executive Order No. 3322, dated September 1, 1920, the land in question was placed under the jurisdiction of the War Department. This department stated in a letter dated October 3, 1928, that—

> Relative to the use by the State Department of a part of Paitilla Point Military Reservation, the War Department has no objection to the proposed use by the State Department of the area referred to, nor has it any objection to the recession of that area to the Republic of Panama, provided the three following conditions are fulfilled:
> 1. The private title thereto remains in the Government of the United States.
>
> 2. The military authorities have free and unrestricted use of all roads in the area in question, either existing or to be constructed, that provide access to and from the Paitilla Point Military Reservation through this area to the main highway in Panaman territory.
> 3. Should the property ceded cease to be used by the State Department, it shall be ceded back to the United States and returned to the control of the War Department.

If this bill should be enacted by Congress, it is proposed to effect the contemplated modification by an exchange of notes which will contain the conditions proposed by the War Department. The suggested change in the existing boundary line, therefore, is for the purpose of effecting a technical transfer of jurisdiction. Land now within the Canal Zone and under the jurisdiction of the United States is by this bill placed within the boundary of the Republic of Panama. Upon the erection of a legation by the United States upon this land the jurisdiction thus secured by Panama is again yielded back to the United States in accordance with the practice of diplomatic immunity and exemption from local jurisdiction.

Mr. CLANCY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LINTHICUM. I yield.

Mr. CLANCY. Because of the peculiar character of the sovereignty of this land, does the gentleman think that the eighteenth amendment would be enforced at the embassy or not?

Mr. LINTHICUM. I heard the discussion of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD], and if the gentleman lived in my city he would understand the ground-rent system much better than he does, living in the State of Wisconsin.

Mr. STAFFORD. I am familiar with the ground-rent system, which is similar to that ancient heritage of the city of Baltimore.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Well, I think that at least two-thirds of all the property in Baltimore is subject to ground rents, just as Panama is subject to it. If a man has property subject to ground rent, he still feels he has title to it.

Mr. STAFFORD. But when it comes to the final analysis, he has not title to it.

Mr. LINTHICUM. But not 1 per cent of them ever revert to the ground-rent owner.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That with respect to that parcel of land in the Panama Canal Zone known as the Paitilla Point Military Reservation, title to which was acquired by the Government of the United States under the conventions concluded on November 18, 1903, and September 2, 1914, between the United States and Panama, the Secretary of State be, and he is hereby, authorized and empowered to effect with the Republic of Panama a modification of the boundary line between the Panama Canal Zone and the Republic of Panama so that such line shall then run as follows:

"Beginning at a concrete monument marked "E," which is a point on the line on the north boundary of the Paitilla Point Military Reservation as shown on Panama Canal Drawing No. X–6053–1, whose geodetic coordinates are latitude 8° 58′ plus 4,445.06 feet and longitude 79° 31′ plus 923.51 feet, and following along a course of south 33° east for 790 feet to a concrete monument marked "F"; thence along a course of south 21° 45′ east for a distance of 490 feet to a concrete monument marked "G"; thence along a course of south 52° west for 870 feet to a concrete monument marked "H"; thence along a course of south 76° 30′ west for 780 feet more or less to a point marked "I" on the map, which is an imaginary point located on the center line of the Matasnillo River, which forms the west boundary of the military reservation. All bearings are true. All coordinates are referred to the Panama Colon Datum.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. STAFFORD: Page 2, line 5, at the end of section 1 add obvert quotation marks.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House with an amendment, with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to and the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. ROGERS, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 7119) to authorize the modification of the boundary line between the Panama Canal Zone and the Republic of Panama, and for other purposes, and had directed him to report the same back to the House with an amendment, with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to and the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and amendment to final passage.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. LINTHICUM, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

TREASURY AND POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. BYRNS, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported the bill (H. R. 9699, Rept. No. 605) making appropriations for the Treasury and Post Office Departments for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, and for other purposes, which was read the first and second time and, together with the accompanying report, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and ordered printed.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana reserved all points of order.

CONSERVATION OF ESTATES OF AMERICAN CITIZENS DYING WITHIN CONSULATES

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 6310) to amend section 1709 of the Revised Statutes, as amended by the act of March 3, 1911 (36 Stat. 1082), and section 304 of the Budget and Accounting Act, 1921 (42 Stat. 24).

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maryland calls up a bill, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 1709 of the Revised Statutes, as amended by the act of March 3, 1911 (36 Stat. 1083), and section 304 of the Budget and Accounting act, 1921 (42 Stat. 24), is hereby further amended by substituting for fourth, fifth, and sixth paragraphs new paragraphs fourth, fifth, sixth, and seventh, reading as follows:

"Fourth. To sell at auction, after reasonable public notice, such part of the estate as shall be of a perishable nature, and such further part, if any, as shall be necessary for the payment of his debts incurred in such country.

"Fifth. To transmit the balance of the estate to the General Accounting Office to be holden in trust for the legal claimant; except that if at any time before such transmission the legal representatives of the deceased shall appear and demand his effects which are in the hands of such consul or vice consul, said consul or vice consul shall deliver them up, being paid their fees, costs, and expenses, and shall cease their proceedings.

"Sixth. The Comptroller General of the United States, or such member of the General Accounting Office as he may duly empower to act as his representative for the purpose, shall act as conservator of such parts of these estates as may be received by the General Accounting Office or are in its possession, and for their protection he may order such effects to be sold as may consist of jewelry or other articles which have heretofore or may hereafter be so received, and pay the expenses of such sale out of the proceeds, provided application for these effects shall not have been made by the legal claimant within six years after their receipt. The Comptroller General is authorized, in the name of the deceased, to receive any balances due to such estates, to draw therefor on banks, safe deposits, trust or loan companies, or other like institutions, to indorse all checks, bills of exchange, promissory notes, and other evidences of indebtedness due to such estates, and take such other steps as necessary for their collection, and to do and perform all and any other acts necessary for the conservation of such estates. The net proceeds of such sales, together with such other moneys as may be collected by him, shall be deposited into the Treasury to a fund in trust for the legal claimant and reported to the Secretary of State.

"Seventh. If no claim to the effects the proceeds of which have been so deposited shall have been received from a legal claimant of the deceased within six years from the date of the receipt of the effects by the General Accounting Office, the funds so deposited, with any remaining unsold effects less transmittal charges, shall be transmitted by that office to the proper officers of the State or Territory of the domicile of the deceased citizen, if known, or, if not, such funds shall be covered into the general fund of the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts on account of proceeds of deceased citizens, and any such remaining unsold effects shall be disposed of by the General Accounting Office in such manner as, in the judgment of the Comptroller General, is deemed appropriate, or they may be destroyed if considered no longer possessed of any value: Provided, That when the estate shall be valued in excess of $500, and no claim therefor has been presented to the General Accounting Office by a legal claimant within the period specified in this paragraph or the legal claimant is unknown, before disposition of the estate as provided herein, notice shall be given by publishing once a week for four consecutive weeks in a newspaper published in the county of the last-known domicile of the deceased, the expense thereof to be deducted from the proceeds of such estate, and any lawful claim received as the result of such advertisement shall be adjusted and settled as provided for herein."

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MAAS.]

Mr. MAAS. Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is very simple. In the days when the accounting office was part of the Treasury Department, the functions performed by consuls abroad in handling the estates of American citizens who died intestate abroad were reported directly through the Treasury Department. In 1921, when the accounting office was separated from the Treasury, some of the functions and some of the authority was not transferred to the accounting office, so that we have a situation where there is dual authority, and this bill simply seeks to correct the administration of a technical operation.

In addition to that, however, which is purely technical, the committee went into the whole subject, and did include a new principle, that is, that where estates are in excess of $500, of American citizens dying abroad, before final disposition, which shall not be before six years after the debts are paid, the residue, instead of being covered into the Federal Treasury, shall be given to the county or State of the deceased, if it can be ascertained. That is provided for by publication. It is only where there is no other means of disposing of the residue of the estate that it is covered into the Federal Treasury.

I have an amendment which, by agreement with the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD], will, I think, make the bill satisfactory to him and to the committee. It also has the approval of the general accounting office and the State Department.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAAS. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. One of the purposes of this bill was to provide for the disposition of funds that were not specifically provided for under the law?

Mr. MAAS. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. The old law was passed in 1792 and there has been but one amendment to that law, which was in 1911. The creation of the Comptroller General's office has made it necessary that this law be passed to meet the changed conditions and also to clarify the existing law. Those were some of the purposes which prompted the reporting of this bill?

Mr. MAAS. Yes. The gentleman from Texas was a member of the subcommittee which considered this bill and that subcommittee held rather extensive hearings. The purpose of the amendment is to prohibit the selling of the personal effects or investments other than those absolutely essential to the payment of the debts of the deceased incurred in such country, and all articles of a personal and sentimental nature, such as jewelry and the like, are to be returned to this country and held for six years.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota in order to offer the amendment, but I do not yield the floor.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. LOZIER). If the gentleman yields for that purpose, he loses the floor.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Then, Mr. Speaker, I offer the amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Maryland offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LINTHICUM: Page 2, line 2, after the word "country," strike out the period, insert a comma and the following:

"And at the expiration of one year from his decease the residue, if no legal claimant has appeared, provided that investments of bonds, shares of stock, and notes of indebtedness, and also articles of a purely personal or sentimental value, such as jewelry, heirlooms, keepsakes, etc., shall not be sold unless necessary for the payment of debts incurred in such country."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have the paragraph read as amended.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 9:

"Fourth. To sell at auction, after reasonable public notice, such part of the estate as shall be of a perishable nature, and such further part, if any, as shall be necessary for the payment of his debts incurred in such country; and at the expiration of one year from his decease the residue, if no legal claimant has appeared, provided that investments of bonds, shares of stock, and notes of indebtedness, and also articles of a purely personal or sentimental value, such as jewelry, heirlooms, keepsakes, etc., shall not be sold unless necessary for the payment of debts incurred in such country."

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin such time as he may desire to use.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, when this bill was up for consideration on the Consent Calendar I called the attention of the House to the fact that as it was drawn the consular officer abroad would only have the right to sell the personal effects of the deceased to the extent that it was necessary to pay his debts. It occurred to me that there might be instances where an American citizen dying abroad might have a large quantity of bulky personal property without having any debts, and that under the phraseology of the revised bill that bulky personal property would have to be transported to this country and held for six years by the Accounting Office as warehouseman.

Through the courtesy of the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, a representative of the Accounting Office called on me yesterday, and I pointed out to him the objection which I thought militated against the bill as drafted by the Accounting Office. After I called his attention to the instant matter he agreed with my position and suggested an amendment. Because of my floor duties and committee duties I was unable to get in contact with him, so I suggested to the gentleman from Minnesota a further amendment, which would provide that not only articles of jewelry and articles of a personal and sentimental character should be withheld from sale, when not necessary to pay debts, but also bonds, certificates of stock, and promissory notes should be withdrawn from the right of sale abroad when not needed to pay debts.

Although the gentleman from Minnesota has incorporated that in the proposed amendment, which meets my original objection, I now direct the attention of the gentleman from Minnesota and also the gentleman from Maryland to the necessity of perhaps modifying the sixth paragraph.

My attention was not called to this until the reading of the bill by the Clerk. This bill is predicated upon the idea that the accounting office should only have in its possession jewelry and other similar articles, and I would suggest that after the word "consist" you should insert the same phraseology which you have agreed to incorporate in your amendment—bonds, shares of stock, and promissory notes, and also jewelry or other articles. In other words, I am suggesting that you insert a similar amendment following the word "consist" in line 17.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Will the gentleman from Wisconsin offer that amendment? I see no objection to it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. What is the gentleman's amendment?

Mr. STAFFORD. The accounting officer yesterday suggested an amendment that only articles of a purely personal or sentimental value, such as jewelry, heirlooms, and keepsakes, shall not be sold, except when necessary to pay debts incurred in such country, and I suggested to the gentleman from Minnesota to-day that that should be broadened so as to include bonds, shares of stock, and notes of indebtedness.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. That is with reference to section 4?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes. I now direct attention to the need of having this language also included in paragraph 6.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Section 4 is with reference to the sale of property abroad, whereas section 6 is with reference to the sale of property here by the Accounting Office after the property has been transmitted here.

Mr. STAFFORD. Now, we have delimited the right of the consular representative abroad, when it is not necessary for the payment of debts, to sell bonds, shares of stock, and promissory notes, because they may be of more value to the heirs here and therefore should not be sacrificed on the public auction block abroad. Having this incorporated in the amendment now pending before the House, I suggest the further need of amending section 6 to incorporate bonds, shares of stock, and notes of indebtedness after the word "consist," so the language will read:

The Comptroller General of the United States, or such member of the General Accounting Office as he may duly empower to act as his representative for the purpose, shall act as conservator of such parts of these estates as may be received by the General Accounting Office or are in its possession, and for their protection he may order such effects to be sold as may consist of bonds, shares of stock, promissory notes, and also jewelry or other articles.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. That sale would not be made until after the expiration of the six years?

Mr. STAFFORD. Not until after the 6-year period.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. It has been some time since the subcommittee had the hearings, but, as I recall, the reason jewelry and articles of that nature were stipulated was because quite a number of such articles had accumulated and they were taking up a great deal of space and they wanted to dispose of them. With respect to the bonds, I suppose it would be necessary to sell them before final settlement, and I can see no reason why, after the expiration of six years, the bonds may not be sold, as well as the jewelry, and convert the estate into cash. That is the purpose of the gentleman's amendment, as I understand it.

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LINTHICUM].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment without waiving the right of the gentleman from Maryland to retain and control the floor.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin under those conditions.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. STAFFORD: On page 2, line 17, after the word "consist," insert "of bonds, shares of stock, notes of indebtedness, and also."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. KNUTSON].

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed out of order for a few moments.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

There was no objection.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, during the time that the debt moratorium was under consideration by the House and by the other body, several Members quoted Sir Ramsay MacDonald as having said:

The moratorium, thank God, ended all foreign debts, and never again will our people, those of the English nation or those of any other country in Europe, be troubled with the payment of debts that have been asserted to be due from those countries to the United States of America.

The language attributed to Mr. MacDonald seemed to me to be so far-fetched and utterly baseless that I determined to write and ask him whether he had been correctly quoted. Perhaps I should have taken the matter up through the regular channels, but in my ignorance of the proper procedure I took it up direct, following the illustrious example of another gentleman at the other end of the Capitol.

I wrote the Prime Minister as follows:

DECEMBER 23, 1931.

Hon. RAMSAY MACDONALD,
London, England.

MY DEAR MR. MACDONALD: In the course of the debate had in the American Congress on the proposal to declare a moratorium for debtor nations to the United States, opponents to the proposal several times quoted you in substance as follows:

"That the moratorium, thank God, ended all foreign debts, and never again will our people—those of the English nation or those of any other country in Europe—be troubled with the payment of the debts that have been asserted to be due from those countries unto the United States of America."

For the record will you be so kind as to advise me whether you have been correctly quoted. I will appreciate very much your doing so.

With kindest personal regards and with the season's greetings, I beg to remain,

Yours very truly,

——— ———.

Under the date of February 6 I received a reply through the British Embassy, which I will send to the Clerk's desk to be read in my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the Clerk reading the letter?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the letter, as follows:

BRITISH EMBASSY,
Washington, February 6, 1932.

SIR: I am directed by His Majesty's ambassador to refer to your letter of December 23 addressed to the Prime Minister, in which you informed him that in the course of the debate in the United States Congress on the President's proposal for a 1-year moratorium on intergovernmental debts opponents to the proposal had quoted Mr. Ramsay MacDonald as follows:

"That the moratorium, thank God, ended all foreign debts, and never again will our people—those of the English nation or those of any other country in Europe—be troubled with the payment of debts that have been asserted to be due from those countries unto the United States of America."

The Prime Minister regrets that this should be the case, for he has never made use, either in public speech or in private conversation, of any words remotely resembling those ascribed to him in the above passage.

In reality Mr. Ramsay MacDonald has urged the speedy solution of the question of international debts by means of consultation and cooperation between the nations concerned. In particular, he stated in the House of Commons on December 9:

"The Government regret the unnecessary delay in bringing the nations concerned around the conference table to settle these questions of international debts which lie at the basis of our currency position."

I am, sir,

Very truly yours,

T. A. SHONE, Secretary.

THE HON. HAROLD KNUTSON,
Committee on Insular Affairs,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, I commend the reading of the MacDonald letter to the membership of both Houses, more especially to those who have quoted him, as the RECORD shows, without ground or justification. [Applause.]

Mr. LANKFORD of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

Mr. LANKFORD of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I feel that of infinitely more importance than all this Congress has done or evidently intends to do are the efforts of a few of us to stop the present wholesale foreclosure of farm loans, undo the harm already done, prevent its occurrence in the future, and help the farmers get a square deal in marketing their products and in taxation.

Just here let me say even the matter of national taxes is not so important as the question of saving the homes of the farmers. They do not object to fair and reasonable taxes if they can save their homes and are prosperous. To impose an additional national tax on them now when they are being destroyed is an outrage and I shall oppose it in every way possible. I shall oppose and vote against a general sales tax for the same reason among others. I further feel that every head of a family, for home purposes, should have a reasonable exemption from all taxes, national, State, county, and city. No other move would increase the number of happy home owners so much as this tax exemption.

In every way possible Congress should reduce Federal taxes, and yet this will not at all undo the evil effects of wholesale loan foreclosures. It is interesting to note just here that all sales of property for taxes are under State laws and not under national tax levies. Federal taxes are indirect and at present are largely borne by the very wealthy class.

Another very interesting thing is that according to the report of the United States Treasury Department during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1931, the State of Georgia paid into the United States Treasury in internal revenue a total of $6,721,313.18, and the United States Treasury during the same period paid out directly to the State of Georgia, under cooperative arrangements, on good roads and otherwise the total sum of $6,799,955.05 or a total of $78,641.87 more than Georgia had paid in for the same period. So Georgia, as a State, did not lose in this respect. This does not at all take into consideration the money spent by the United States Government in Georgia for mail service, river and harbor improvements, agriculture, military or naval affairs, in payments to veterans as pensions or adjusted compensation, or otherwise, and so on and so on.

Though these matters are vitally important to my people, yet they pale into insignificance when compared with the refusal of Congress to give the farmer and the independent individual citizen a square deal as compared with the legislative aid given to the great combines of wealth.

I wish I had time to read into the RECORD the many letters which I receive approving my efforts in behalf of the farmers and the average citizen. From the scores of such highly appreciated communications from all over the Nation I now only mention the names and addresses of those writing me from my district during the last few days as follows: Jake W. Paulk, Ocilla; Harris Perry, Valdosta; R. E. Findley, route No. 1, Mystic; J. R. Bowen, Rockingham; J. M. Floyd, originally Blackshear, now Fort Benning; John Thompson, route No. 2, Hahira; Ben Hicks, Adel; B. F. Mills, Pearson; George R. Hester, Adel; George McMillan, Alapaha; S. L. Henderson, Blackshear; J. D. Hancock, Nashville; Mr. and Mrs. Reddick Davis, route No. 1, box 47, Patterson; G. T. Bazemore, Pearson; Alex Holmes, route No. 1, Fitzgerald; Silas Johnson, Baxley; C. H. Williamson, Offerman; George A. Young, Folkston; W. H. Hamm, Ray City; H. T. Heard, route No. 1, Valdosta; H. H. Ramsey, Boston; W. E. Ring, route No. 4, Valdosta; James Branch, route No. 3, Baxley; T. A. Sherrod, Howell; J. B. Kinard, route No. 2, Lenox; S. King, Alapaha; T. J. Howard, Waycross; J. H. Howard, route No. 1, box 96, Waycross; and Frank K. Meason, box 1, Sterling.

Mr. Speaker, not only my people but the patriotic people of the whole Nation strongly indorse the fight of a few here to preserve the homes of America. If these are lost, nothing else would be worth saving.

Mr. Speaker, it is said that if the sun was blotted out it would suddenly become so cold until all animal and vegetable life would freeze to death in three days' time. From the home radiates the sunshine of civilization, encompassing the earth and serving and making mankind better everywhere. If all the homes of the farmer and the average citizen were blotted out, the darkness of crime, the awful chill of selfishness, and the chaos of our expiring institutions would soon mock and scoff at the last days of this the greatest Government ever instituted by man.

Ah! Mr. Speaker, the signs of the times indicate clearly that unless heroic treatment is speedily applied to our economic ills, this Nation will soon lose the individual independent farmer and with him will lose the small independent business man and citizen, their homes and all that the home influence of these and such as these mean to our national life.

As patriotic representatives of our people let us, in this time of stress, fight for the right as never before, and may God give us the power and the courage to see and do our whole duty.

Mr. Speaker, the farmer will judge our services here, not by deceptive newspaper headlines nor by misleading platform pledges or other political promises, but by the effect of our legislation on his general welfare. Will the farmer as the result of our efforts get a better price for his product; will he have a greater net profit; will he save his home from foreclosure and be able to finance his affairs more easily; will his tax burden be lighter; and can he of his own accord easily see that his condition has been improved? The answer to this question will convince the farmer in no uncertain way whether or not this Congress has done anything worth while for him.

I can visualize some Members of this House during next summer meeting statements from the farmers back home something like these. What good did the foreign debts moratorium do the farmer who got no moratorium and whose home was sold by a Federal Land Bank or other long-term loan concern?

What good did the Reconstruction Finance Corporation do the farmer who lost his home by a foreclosure and who now has a large family but neither a home nor employment?

What good did the $125,000,000 additional money voted the Federal land banks do the farmers whose lands were sold by the Federal land banks with unabated ruthlessness both before and after the authorization and appropriation of this money?

What good will all the good roads do the farmers if their lands are to be relentlessly taken over by governmental and other agencies and sold to large chain farming organizations to the utter destruction of the individual independent farmer?

How much less will be the anguish of the farmer and his family where the Government, after turning them out of their home, paves a good road near the old homestead for some corporation which becomes the owner of the property at an outrageously low price during this depression?

How much will the farmers be benefited by the country's becoming honeycombed with good roads if the farmers and their folks are to become slaves and hirelings and the farms of the Nation are to pass into the hands of farming corporations, as must be the case unless something is done, and that speedily, to stop the present loan-foreclosure orgy and to get lands already sold back into the hands of the farmers of the Nation?

How much will it help the farmer to appropriate millions for agricultural purposes if his agricultural activities have been stopped?

Why help the farmer fight boll weevils when his farm is gone?

What good to farmer John Smith are hog serums and every imaginable, conceivable remedy for animals and vegetables, fruit trees, and what not of the farm, when some one else owns John Smith's farm?

What good to the farmers are paved roads, beautiful streets, electric lights, new post-office buildings, new department buildings here in Washington, consolidation of bureaus, and so on, and so on, from one year to another and from one election to another, if the particular farmer's home has been sold by foreclosure, he and his family turned out in a cruel, heartless world, with no employment, with his every hope for himself and family blasted, and with only cruel, relentless suffering and slavery facing him and his loved ones forever?

But, Mr. Speaker, why prolong this list of questions which answer themselves?

This Congress is passing many laws; but will some one please tell me what has been done yet to help the farmer get a better price for his product, help him get fertilizer at a more reasonable price, help him save a greater net profit, help him save his home, or help him get relieved of part of his too heavy tax burden?

What has been done to help the farmer make more money or to help the laborer earn and get more salary? Has not Congress thus far been wholly engaged in causing the people and the Government to create larger, more dangerous debts to pay smaller, less troublesome ones?

No person ever extricated himself from a bog by gradually becoming mired deeper and deeper, and no debtor ever was able to borrow himself out of debt.

What laws have been enacted by Congress to stop the present depression by removing its cause, curing, so far as possible, its effects, and preventing its recurrence in the future?

What has been done or suggested to solve the farm problem or the transportation problem or the labor problem?

What has been done to insure labor employment in the future at a reasonable wage?

I would be glad if anyone would answer these questions by speech, extension of remarks, or otherwise.

They are being asked to-day, and they will be asked next summer. Some who are ignoring the farmers and the average individual citizen to-day will have to answer these questions and many more like them. Many can not answer them, and the people at the ballot box will then make reply for them.

Mr. Speaker, before I conclude I wish to state that the Department of Agriculture has agreed that no restriction be imposed so as to force any farmer who obtains a loan for production purposes to plant less than four acres of tobacco.

Mr. W. R. Wilson, president of Douglas Chamber of Commerce of my district, wired me, calling my attention to the evils of making the limitation as little as three acres of tobacco per individual farmer, and Senators SMITH of South Carolina, GEORGE of Georgia and Representatives MITCHELL of Tennessee, LARSEN of Georgia, and myself went to the Department of Agriculture and were promised that the change just mentioned would be made.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to speak out of order for 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLACK. The Foreign Affairs Committee has reported House Joint Resolution 275, concerning our contribution to the Interparliamentary Union. I understand there are objections to it. It seems the most important of all the legislation reported by this committee. The objections are based on economy. Of all the agencies for world peace and stabilization, the Interparliamentary Union can best serve the purpose.

The basic make-up of the Interparliamentary Union toward peace, as contrasted with the other groups—having in mind the League of Nations and the World Court—guarantees better results from the Interparliamentary Union. In the first place, the Interparliamentary Union is a group of legislators from the various parliaments of the world, a group of men like ourselves, closer to the people than the executive branch of any government, more representative than the executive branch of any government, more responsive to the will of the people than the executive branch of any government. The other so-called agencies for international accord and understanding are largely made up of diplomats, the executive branch of the Government, aided by military men and naval men. The main business of diplomats seems to be skullduggery, and the main business of admirals and generals, of course, seems to be war. The main business of legislators is lawmaking in the interest of the people.

We are confronted by a situation in the Far East which in a way was presented to the House to-day by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH]. The Interparliamentary Union has tried to establish a uniform, basic international law. There is a great deal of misunderstanding about the Far East situation. That is so because the ordinary man in this country or in any other country can not appreciate the meaning of the 9-power pact, can not appreciate the meaning of the Kellogg pact. That is true not only of the ordinary man but of men high in public life. If the Interparliamentary Union were given the support of all countries that a legislative body is entitled to, it could well put the world on some kind of a permanent, understandable, legal basis. If we had a basic, determined, accepted code of international law, the man on the street would readily understand when a nation violates it. How does he know now with your 9-power pact and your Kellogg pact and your League of Nations or your World Court? He does not know where one commences and the other ends, and he does not understand their conflicts and can not reconcile them. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH], on the floor of the House to-day, takes a diametrically opposite view of the Kellogg pact from that entertained by the Secretary of State. On these foreign affairs it is about time that the great minds of the administration found some sort of coordination. The gentleman from New York insists that the country is under no obligation in respect to the Sino-Japanese situation because of the Kellogg pact. A great many people in this country have always contended that the Kellogg pact was nothing more than a gesture. If it means anything, and the interpretation that it is an actual legal entity is to be accepted, then the Kellogg pact has been absolutely violated by Japan, and we have an obligation under it. Some people have always said that the Kellogg pact is nothing but an idle gesture on which political advantage in this country was to be reached. I must note the distinguished ranking member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs seems to agree with that interpretation.

As to the 9-power treaty, the Secretary of State to-day in the communication to the chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee suggests that the 9-power pact was an essential part of the Washington Disarmament Conference, and there is no doubt about that. It was an essential part of the Washington Disarmament Conference. The Secretary goes one step further and he says that the violation of the 9-power pact by Japan would be good reason for this country to forget the disarmament conference and the subsequent treaties relative to the Washington conference and go ahead and build a Navy without regard to the limitations of either the Washington conference or the London treaty.

The 9-power pact was just as binding on us as it was binding on Japan, as it was binding on any other country that attended the Washington Disarmament Conference. If the Secretary of State is going to make a point of a violation of the 9-power pact, then let us set a good example to the world. The ranking member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs was in the House the day we adopted the Porter resolution. The Porter resolution was the expression of this House on our obligation under the 9-power pact. The Porter resolution called on the administration to get out of China, to get our courts out of China, to allow China to be a real sovereignty, to allow the Chinese to build up their own government, to allow the Chinese to work out their own destiny. If our administrations had lived up to our obligations under the 9-power pact we would not have the trouble to-day in the Far East that we have. The Porter resolution was adopted by almost a two-thirds vote of this House, and yet nothing has been done by the State Department to live up to the suggestions of the House in that respect.

The Japanese have gone into Manchuria. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] indicates that to his mind that is of small moment. It is a very important matter. They have taken over to themselves an empire, they have taken over to themselves rich territory, territory loaded with worth-while mineral resources, territory that adds materially to the strength and wealth of Japan and to her relative national standing. It is no small matter at all. The Japanese have gone into Shanghai and have shot at the Chinese in Shanghai. If we are going to protest against the Japanese I believe we should, in the interest of our own standing in the world and in the interest of our own treaties, first clear ourselves before the world. We fired on Nanking a few years ago. We, with the British, fired on the innocent people of Nanking a few years ago. We ought to clear the air as to our own position. We ought to assemble the nations of the world signatories to the 9-power treaty.

We assembled them before and adopted the 9-power pact. We should assemble them again and let the nations of the world say to China and to Japan that all of the nations are going to live up to the 9-power pact, that all of the nations are going to get out of China and give up extraterritoriality.

We say in one breath in the 9-power pact and under the Hay open-door policy, that China is an independent sovereignty, and in the next breath we say that we must have our courts within the lands of this independent sovereignty.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK. I yield.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Does the gentleman not think that we have made great progress in the note sent by the State Department that the United States would refuse to recognize title to Manchuria, taken by aggression? Is that not a considerable stride forward?

Mr. BLACK. The trouble with all the notes sent by the State Department is that neither Japan nor any other country will receive them at face value. The Japanese and everybody else know the psychology of this country, and they know that this series of notes has been a series of bluffs; that they have had no force, no strength, especially when it comes from a country that has itself not observed good faith with China. The way to do the thing is to do it basically, in a clean way, by ourselves declaring that we will observe the 9-power pact, and then insist that Japan go along with the other nations which signed the 9-power treaty.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. The gentleman understands that the League of Nations itself accepted the doctrine written by the State Department of the United States, and also has said that it will decide whether or not to recognize title to territory taken by conquest.

Mr. BLACK. I do not think it makes much difference to the Japanese what the League of Nations does. It has not so far. The only way to clear up the Far East situation permanently is to get back to the 1922 treaty and look it over and see that its obligations are lived up to by everybody, including Japan and ourselves. Of course, the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] does not want trouble. Nobody else wants trouble. But Japan must be stopped. There is a present way of doing it outside of my suggestion; that is by going to war. There is another present way of doing it outside of my suggestion; that is by limiting Japanese trade. It does not have to be done through governmental suggestion. The Government does not have to boycott Japan. The business people of this country can do it. The women of this country can do it by refusing to buy Japanese silk. That is a method that is peaceful enough. Japan will appreciate its loss of trade and come to terms; but if the Government is going to do anything, let them do it in a wholesome fashion and start right with China and start right with all the other countries which signed the 9-power treaty.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks on postage rates.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Speaker, the Treasury Department has recommended an increase in first-class postage rates as a means of raising revenues and have presented such a proposal to the Committee on Ways and Means. I believe the fixing of rates of postage should be left with the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads and am taking this opportunity to explain my position to the Members of the House.

FIVE REASONS WHY POSTAGE RATES SHOULD BE LEFT TO POST OFFICE COMMITTEE

1. Jurisdiction: Never in the history of Congress have postage rates been changed by any other committee than the Post Office and Post Roads Committee, except during the War of 1812 and the World War. In war, all rules lapse, but there is no justification now for the Ways and Means Committee dealing with postage rates.

2. No right to levy tax through postage rates: In the Constitutional Convention, 1787, two attempts were made to provide that the Postal Service might be used to raise revenues to defray the cost of government. Both of these attempts were decisively rejected. It has been the universal view that postal charges should not be such as would levy a tax upon the people.

3. No justification for 3-cent rate: The entire deficit of $98,000,000 for 1931 was due to a business depression, which decreased the volume of mail. For the 15 years preceding 1930 the annual increase in revenues averaged $30,000,000. If that increased revenue had kept up, there would have been no substantial deficit. The present deficit can be entirely eliminated in the next few years by the normal increase of postal revenues.

The 3-cent rate will not mean correspondingly greater revenues. It will mean a reduction in volume of the mail, which in turn will mean a higher cost on every letter handled. There is a definite overhead cost in the Postal Service. The postmasters, letter carriers, clerks, and others are on the job. They can handle a certain volume of mail at the most economic cost possible. Reduce that volume and the cost goes up, and in the end the deficit is greater.

In the act of February 28, 1925, we increased the rate on post cards from 1 cent to 2 cents, on the statement that it would increase revenues $10,000,000 a year. The actual experience showed that we lost $6,000,000 of the amount which had been received at the 1-cent rate. Congress immediately restored the rate, and the volume has been slowly coming back to the previous point.

If 3 cents is now made the letter-postage rate, business men all over the country will stop expenditures, and it will be very difficult to get them started again even when the rate is reduced to its formal level.

This 2-cent rate was fixed in 1885, being reduced from the former rate of 3 cents. The growth of per capita use of the Postal Service shows how good a business move this was. The one way to overcome the deficit is through low postage rates, which will make the increased volume a source of aggregate revenues.

4. First-class rates now pay a profit: In the Postmaster General's report you will see that the first-class mail matter is the only class which shows a gain. There is a loss in second, third, and fourth classes, but the first class shows a gain of many millions. It is most unjust to make those who use first-class mail, and pay a rate now which shows a profit, cover also all the losses on other classes. If we are to embark on higher postage rates, why not raise the rates on the losing classes rather than on the profit-making class?

5. Deficit not due to postal wages, and so forth: The present deficit is in no way caused by the wages paid the workers. The fact of the matter is that at the present wages letters are being handled at a less unit cost than they were in 1885 when the 2-cent rate was established. Since 1913 postal employees have practically doubled their productivity, as measured by revenues, but their wages have only gone up 75 per cent. In proportion to their increased efficiency they are receiving less than they did before the World War.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH].

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to speak out of order for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, my distinguished colleague the gentleman from New York [Mr. BLACK] has just put some words into my mouth which imply an entirely different meaning as to my views of the Kellogg-Briand pact.

I believe I am one of the few who do sincerely and honestly favor the Kellogg-Briand pact. I am convinced that it is a psychological deterrent against war. I do not believe it is going to end wars. When we renounced war as a national policy except for defense it was a great step forward in the cause of peace. In the case of Japan, unfortunately, it did not act as a deterrent either in Manchuria or Shanghai.

When I advocated renouncing the sale and export of munitions of war, certainly that is the next step if we are honest with ourselves. If we renounce war as an instrument of national policy, then it logically follows that we should renounce the sale of munitions of war to foreign countries with whom we are at peace.

Mr. MORTON D. HULL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield.

Mr. MORTON D. HULL. Does the gentleman believe we should renounce a defensive war?

Mr. FISH. Certainly not.

Mr. MORTON D. HULL. Then if two nations are engaged in war there must be some distinction between them in respect to our duty toward them.

Mr. FISH. Not as far as the shipment of munitions and arms are concerned. Let me answer the gentleman from New York first. The gentleman intimated that the Kellogg pact carried some form of coercion with it. When former Secretary of State Kellogg appeared before the Senate committee he was asked that question before the committee would act. He was asked, "Does the Kellogg-Briand pact imply any form of coercion whatever?" He told the Senate committee it did not imply any form of coercion. Then he made a number of speeches about it and put it into writing, stating very definitely that adherence to the Briand-Kellogg pact outlawing war as an instrument of national policy did not carry with it any form of coercion whatever.

I said a few moments ago that it was the duty of the Secretary of State to announce the policy of the United States by pointing out to the world that the Kellogg pact had been violated, had been trampled upon by Japan, ruthlessly, and to have had such a statement published in every paper throughout the world and made the same kind of a firm, dignified statement about the 9-power pact and stopped there. That is all that should be done. I am opposed to this continuous bombardment of Japan by useless notes that makes confusion worse confounded.

My friend, the gentleman from Minnesota, just spoke a few moments ago, quoting an alleged statement from the Prime Minister of Great Britain, which Prime Minister MacDonald has denied, to the effect that the moratorium meant that Great Britain would not have to pay us any more money.

I want to take the few minutes remaining to state to the Members here that Great Britain has always kept faith on her debts, and has paid to us the vast sum of $1,300,000,000 since the war on her debt settlement. [Applause.]

If we did drive a harsh bargain with any nation it was with Great Britain when we demanded and secured 80 cents on the dollar for the money we loaned her during the war, when we only asked from France that amount of money which we loaned her after the war, and only demanded from Italy 25 cents on the dollar. So I say to you that when you consider any statement of this kind as coming from Great Britain you want to be sure the statement is accurate, for Great Britain has always kept faith with her financial obligations; has always paid her debts and I believe she always will as long as it is financially possible for her to do so. If there is to be any kind of liquidation of these debts, or if there is to be any kind of a rearrangement, the first nation that should be granted any relief by way of a reduction should be Great Britain, because of the honesty and fair dealing she has shown up to date in the payment of her war debts. [Applause.]

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Speaker, I desire to express my appreciation of the action of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] in connection with amendments to this bill, in conjunction with the General Accounting Office. I think they have largely improved the bill. I also desire to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting a letter from the Comptroller General approving the bill and one from the Treasury Department.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maryland?

There was no objection.

The letters referred to follow:

COMPTROLLER GENERAL OF THE UNITED STATES,
Washington, February 2, 1932.

Hon. J. CHARLES LINTHICUM,
Chairman Committee on Foreign Affairs,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: Complying with your request by telephone of to-day, I have the honor to advise that the legislation as embodied in H. R. 6310, Seventy-second Congress, entitled "A bill to amend section 1709 of the Revised Statutes, as amended by the act of March 3, 1911 (36 Stat. 1083), and section 304 of the Budget and Accounting Act, 1921 (42 Stat. 24)," as reported by your committee (H. Rept. No. 223) and pending before the House (House Calendar No. 37; Consent Calendar No. 52), accords with that recommended in my 1931 report, pages 26 to 30 (copy herewith).

I offer no objection thereto.

Sincerely yours,

J. L. MCCARL,
Comptroller General of the United States.

Enclosure.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, February 3, 1932.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: Reference is made to bill H. R. 6310, "To amend section 1709 of the Revised Statutes, as amended by the act of March 3, 1911 (36 Stat. 1083), and section 304 of the Budget and Accounting Act, 1921 (42 Stat. 24)," pertaining to the conservation of estates of American citizens dying within consulates, which has been reported upon by your committee (Rept. No. 223, 72d Cong., 1st sess.).

For the information of your committee you are advised that there is no objection on the part of the Treasury Department to the enactment of the proposed legislation, although as a broad principle the advisability of placing executive functions in the General Accounting Office may be questioned.

Very truly yours,

A. W. MELLON,
Secretary of the Treasury.

Hon. J. CHARLES LINTHICUM,
Chairman Committee on Foreign Affairs,
House of Representatives.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JOHNSON] such time as he may desire to use.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to speak out of order for two minutes in order to read a telegram.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. Speaker, this is a telegram with reference to H. R. 4650. It was sent to me by the citizens of my home town and reads as follows:

CORSICANA, TEX., February 17, 1932.

Hon. LUTHER A. JOHNSON,
Member of Congress, Washington, D. C.:

Our association is tremendously interested in the passage of the Glenn-Smith bill. Would prefer it be amended so as to refinance their bonded debts on the replacement value of the improvements as of date March 1, 1932. This would be fair both to the taxpayer and the bondholder. Taxpayers in these districts are not and can not meet their present obligations. Something must be done for their relief and done quickly. The distress is more acute and hopeless than in any other portion of our business world, and relief extended here will do more real and lasting good than to any other of our business institutions in proportion to the amounts involved. Railroads, insurance companies, and banks need help and have secured it, but their troubles are temporary and not so despairing and hopeless, while these districts must have immediate help or they will be wiped out for good. These districts are asking and hoping their obligations may be refinanced at a reduced rate of interest, and a fair and proper set-up of the obligation at its present value, and not one penny of these funds should be lost. Paradoxical as it might appear, yet the fact is that the best and most valuable farming lands of America are to-day suffering most, and more urgently need relief than any other property in our country. Would appreciate your earnest support of the bill.

TEXAS RECLAMATION AND DRAINAGE ASSOCIATION,
By JOHN T. FORTSON, President,
GUY M. GOBSON, Secretary and Treasurer.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill to its final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. LINTHICUM, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

WITHDRAWAL OF DOCUMENTS FROM THE FILES OF THE HOUSE

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw from the files of the House documents filed with H. R. 10520, a bill for the relief of Lottie W. McCaskill, introduced in the Seventy-first Congress, there having been no report, adverse or otherwise, on the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks by printing two statements made by William Hard as a result of personal investigations made in the iron and steel districts of western Pennsylvania.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, may I inquire who the individual is whose statements the gentleman desires to place in the RECORD?

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. William Hard, the well-known radio broadcaster, special writer, and investigator.

Mr. STAFFORD. Are the remarks very extensive?

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Not very extensive. One article is already printed and the other will appear in the March number of the Survey Graphic.

Mr. STAFFORD. How many pages will they take?

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Very few pages.

Mr. STAFFORD. How many? Five, ten, or fifteen?

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. I would say about four.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman is asking for quite a sum of money in order to feature some broadcaster.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Oh, I will say to my friend I consider William Hard a real authority, and his views are well worth while in view of efforts to deal with irregularities in production.

Mr. STAFFORD. The House has recently established the practice of having those matters printed as documents so that Members of the House may avail themselves of them.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. I do not desire to ask that the statements be printed as documents, but I would like to have them made available to Members of the House.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, for the present I will have to object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is heard.

TAX ON GASOLINE

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for two minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, it has just come to my attention that to-morrow, probably, our colleagues will be flooded with letters and telegrams protesting against the levying of any tax on gasoline.

I know not what the committee will do, but this is just an example of the propaganda that is started always on any matter in which a large number of people are interested. I have in my office a copy of a letter that was sent out, generally, to those interested, suggesting to them that they wire or write their Congressmen to-morrow urging them to vote against any tax on gasoline. I ask unanimous consent to include this letter as an extension of these remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

The matter referred to follows:

AMERICAN PETROLEUM INSTITUTE,
New York, N. Y., February 20, 1932.

TO OIL MARKETERS:

A Federal gasoline tax of 1 cent per gallon is certain of passage unless oil men and consumers of gasoline in the United States immediately bring forcefully to the attention of their Congressmen and Senators at Washington their objection to such a tax.

Thursday, February 25, has been designated as "gasoline-tax day." On this date, thirteenth anniversary of the day the first gasoline tax was collected in this country, local agents of the Western Union will call upon you and upon marketers and consumers of gasoline in every State to receive telegrams addressed to those who represent you in Congress and opposing this Federal tax upon gasoline.

Send the telegrams; urge your friends and business acquaintances to do so; refer the Western Union to them. Notify your local newspapers that the telegrams are being sent. Read the messages to the newspapers, giving your name and your firm's name as opposed to Federal taxation of gasoline. Tell the newspapers the whole story of gasoline taxation from that day 13 years ago when Oregon began to collect the first levy of 1 cent per gallon until to-day, when the Federal Government wants to impose a tax that would, in effect, increase existing gasoline-tax rates already as high as 7 cents per gallon, make tax evasion and gasoline bootlegging profitable in every State, and further demoralize the gasoline business.

In addition to communicating with your Congressmen and Senators instruct your salesmen and agents to do likewise, and urge them to ask their dealers and customers to take similar action. Call upon your State officials and have them send their objections to congressional Representatives. Stir up local automobile clubs, motor-truck associations, civic and other organizations to place themselves publicly on record as opposed to this Federal tax. Wherever possible have copies of telegrams, letters, and resolutions released to the local press.

No doubt you have sufficient literature on hand to send a pamphlet to one or more of your Representatives in Congress. Another pamphlet is inclosed. Additional copies of this or any pamphlets previously sent out by the institute will be sent you upon request. Send me copies of any letters you receive from Senators and Representatives making a definite commitment on this important subject.

Thanking you for your cooperation, I am,

Very truly yours,

PAUL E. HADLICK,
Secretary Division of Marketing.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. MOUSER, until March 1, 1932, on account of sudden death in family.
